THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, MARCH 3, 1860.

NEW SERIES.....NO. 60.

Academy; and that resolution, so far as I know, or am informed, has never been rescinded and never withdrawn. It met the approval of my judgment then, and it meets it now; and in voting against any further appropriations, I not only vote in accordance with these instructions, which are some eighteen years old, but I vote also in accordance with the settled convictions of my understanding.

As I said, nobody is responsible for this. I am not a candidate for the Presidency, and take this occasion to avow it distinctly, so that nobody may think that when I speak he hears the programme of any political party anywhere, but simply the convictions of my own understanding. I am against the bill, and I am against the amendment. At the same time, I assure the Senator from Texas that if ten million were necessary for an honest defense of that State, I would give it. I would vote to spend the last dollar in the Treasury, and to raise the last man we could raise, to defend the integrity, and the honor, and the interest of any and every State in the Union; and I do not believe this is necessary for either, and I shall vote against the amendment, and against the bill, whether they are put together or kept apart.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move a reconsideration of the vote taken on the motion to refer the bill and amendment to the Committee on Military Affairs. I am not satisfied with the vote I gave. That dissatisfaction has not been produced, however, by any remarks which have been made on the other side. Their reflections on the Administration, or its failure to discharge its duty, have not influenced this action on my part. Nobody expected, I presume, or supposed that those gentlemen would support, especially at the present time, the action of the present Government; but I think the motion simply because I am not satisfied with the vote I gave. I think, on reflection, that it is proper that the question should go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GWIN. I suggest that subsequent proceedings have taken place, and it is now in order to make the motion without reconsidering that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator can move a reconsideration, if he pleases. He voted with the majority.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Well, if it is in order, I now make the motion to refer the bill and amendment to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN subsequently said: The bill making appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point was, a short time ago, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I am now known to the Senate that the general appropriation bills are never referred to any committee in this body, except the Committee on Finance. This is the first instance that an appropriation bill has been referred to any other committee of the Senate. I would like to rescind the vote by which that bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, with the object of letting it go over, so that that committee may propose amendments to it when the bill comes up for consideration again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire the question to be put on the motion to reconsider?

Mr. GWIN, and others. Let the motion be entered.

Mr. GWIN. I simply make the motion now; it can be called up hereafter.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HALE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. EVERSON. The question is debatable. Several Senators. Let us vote it down.

Mr. EVERSON. I propose to debate it. I hope the motion will not prevail; and I do not understand really any object to be accomplished by it, except that the Senate shall have nothing to do from now until Monday next. It will be remembered that, by an order of the Senate taken last week, to-morrow is set apart for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, and there are one hundred and fifty bills at least on that Calendar to be considered and disposed of. Many of them I know are of pressing necessity. Besides that, there is the whole batch of adverse reports from the Court of Claims, not one of which is yet on the Calendar, and every one of which ought to be considered by the Senate during the session, for they come up every year, and at every Congress, from session to session; and Congress to Congress, until they shall be finally disposed of by the two Houses; and it is wrong, it is unfair, it is unjust, and hard, that the Committee on Claims should be saddled every year with the consideration of these cases, when Congress will never dispose of them. Independent of the strong claims which private individuals have on the justice of Congress to consider their cases, there is this large batch of cases, comprising one hundred and fifty at least, where the Court of Claims have adjudicated adversely to the claimants, not a military case of which has ever been finally settled by Congress, and they have all to come before Congress, from session to session, until finally disposed of. I hope the present Congress will dispose, in some way or other, of the adverse reports of the Court of Claims; either reject them, and pass bills in favor of the claimants, or confirm them.

But there are a great number of cases on your Calendar—I think amounting to at least one hundred or one hundred and fifty cases—reported favorably by the committee, and a number of them referred favorably by the Court of Claims. Now, air, look at the injustice of your action. These parties have been compelled to go to the Court of Claims and file their petitions for relief; they have employed counsel; they have had their cases investigated at great pecuniary expense to them, and they have lost time. The Senate, before Congress with their claims thus sustained by the action of the court, and Congress will not consider them. Men are this day starving because Congress does not attend to their claims; some of the very poorest and most just claims that can ever be presented—claims which, if they were against individual members of this body, they would feel themselves disgraced and dishonored if they did not pay promptly; and yet we are frittering away this time, postponing the consideration of these cases, and causing individuals to come here session after session and Congress after Congress, to ask mere justice at the hands of Congress; and gentlemen, merely to be idle and do nothing, will say, let us adjourn until Monday.

Mr. SUMBULL. We are all convinced over here, if the Senator from Georgia will just allow us to vote.

Mr. EVERSON. Very well.

Mr. GREEN. It is important to have a short executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a motion now pending, that when the Senate adjourns, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. GREEN. I think mine is a privileged motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. So is the other.

Mr. EVERSON. I call for the yeas and nays. Several Senators. Oh, no; let us vote it down.

Mr. EVERSON. Very well.

The motion was not agreed to.

DISBURSING OFFICERS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I now ask the Senate to take up the joint resolution which I was on the eve of having considered yesterday, and to which my friend from Alabama will attend.

The Senate was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. No. 4) allowing a credit to certain disbursing officers therein mentioned was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAY. I wish merely to say, that this resolution passed the Senate during the last session of Congress; it does not make any additional appropriation of money whatever, but only diverts an appropriation heretofore made. When the appropriation referred to in this resolution was made, several years ago, Congress undertook to appropriate it for different kinds of work, and showed its incompetency for works of internal improvement by the result of this appropriation. It was found that it was too little for one kind, and too much for another. Now they come back and ask that we shall divert the fund, and pay men for what they have honestly done for the Government, but which the original bill did not warrant. I understand as it creates no additional appropriation of money, does not propose to expend one cent from the Treasury, and as the committee were fully persuaded that it was just and proper that these men should be paid for their labor, they unanimously reported the measure; and I should have asked the Senate to vote it through some time ago if I had had an opportunity.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope this resolution will be permitted to lie over until to-morrow. This is the first time my attention has been called to it. I know that, in the disposition of the moneys that were set apart for the improvement of the western rivers, that portion which was to have gone to the credit of the Arkansas river was diverted, largely out of proportion, for the navigation of boats and boatsmen, with regard to the residue of the money, during the greater part of the period when it could be used for the purpose, the conduct of the persons in charge of that business was scandalous in the extreme. I will not say now the extent to which it was so; it was not very great. I think, however, that, in looking into this matter, I may find some of the reaching those parties that were concerned in it. If I do, I shall certainly call it to the attention of this body.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I am very sure that my friend from Arkansas will not permit a motion for delay, which can accomplish nothing whatever. This business was chiefly under the control of Colonel Long, who directed it; he was the chief director. John Russell, well known to me, was the agent through whom the disbursements were paid; under the control of Colonel Long, as I understand. The money was appropriated, as has been stated, to the improvement of the river, and to the making of the necessary boats and apparatus for that improvement. It was found, when they came to apply this money, that the appropriation had not been very accurately made, and a portion of the money intended for the improvement of the river was applied to the construction of boats, which were necessary instruments in doing it. When they came to settle their accounts with the Treasury, they found they had used the money for an object for which it was not specifically appropriated, they could not be adjusted. My friend and neighbor, Russell, is growing to be an old man now, and he wants the accounts settled. The vouchers are all in his office; the Government does not want to pay the expenditures; they were necessarily and properly made, but not directly according to law, for the reason I have stated. I hope my friend from Arkansas will allow this resolution to pass at once. It was examined at the last session, and passed without opposition.

Mr. CLAY. Perhaps I should have said, in relation to what is stated by the Senator from Kentucky, that the measure now proposed is approved by the proper Executive Department of the Government. The way it is all just; they only want the authority of Congress to make the payment. I will say, in reply to the Senator from Arkansas, that the only cost here arises from the fact that they expended more money in snags, boats and in preparation for the improvement of two rivers than the original appropriation warranted, and hence I do not think he will find that there is any ground whatever for complaining that injustice was done to his State in regard to the improvement of the Arkansas, and I do not think he will find that it is necessary for the resolution to lie over. If he does, I would suggest to him to allow it to pass, and then if, after examination, he shall conclude to move a reconsideration to-morrow, I will join with him in having it reconsidered.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Kentucky, I think, states the case with great clearness and exactness. I had occasion to look somewhat into these disbursements. The whole difficulty arose from the fact of one appropriation having been made for the boats, and another appropriation for the clearing out of the rivers, and they drew on the appropriation for clearing out the rivers for the construction of boats; and therefore it was found that there was a small balance, as I recollect, of the appropriation for clearing out the rivers that was mixed in with the appropriation for constructing the boats; and it is in such confusion that, without amendment, the accounts cannot be settled. Then there is the fact the Senator from Alabama speaks of—the want of authority to draw from the appropriation for clearing out the rivers for the construction of boats, which, as my memory serves me, rendered it quite impossible for the accounting officers to settle these accounts under the existing law.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If it be true that there are confusions in these accounts, with whom did those confusions originate? I do not know. It is said that money was taken from the regular appropriation for the clearing out of the rivers, to be used for the construction of boats. This, as I question not, is one great source of confusion and difficulty in settling the accounts. In doing so, I have every reason to believe that they went unequally and unfairly to work against the appropriation that there was apart for specific rivers, in favor of the appropriations for the lakes or for other rivers, and it operated hard on the river upon which I reside, and the people living upon which I represent here. I refer to this as a source of confusion and injustice for which I think the superintendent of these internal improvements, Colonel Long, or whoever had charge of this, is responsible; or, if he is not, it may be the accounting officer.

Mr. DAVIS. He was not continuously superintendent, and I think this great source of the irregularities occurred when he was not.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then it falls also on the other. Thus it is that officers who are appointed here under the Executive to disburse moneys appropriated by law, go forward absolutely to the law, and without regard to what we must come in afterwards and pass a special act to enable them to settle their accounts; and that, too, after they have perpetrated severe injustice upon some sections and people. I do not like it; I feel disposed to oppose it; and if it were possible, I would be for fixing the responsibility for the acts which were committed, and which threw those accounts into confusion, upon the parties really guilty.

I presume that this resolution will be passed, whether I oppose it or not, because I can offer no strong hope that I shall be able to expose the parties herein in such a way as to do any ultimate good; but I will call the attention of this body, that it may go before the public, to the fact that the subordinates under these superintendents went to the Western rivers, particularly to the Mississippi, where they anchored their vessels at the mouth of the river; and there they spent weeks at a time, and adjourned off and went down to party at Natchez; came back again, and went off to Memphis on another frolic; turned around then, and ran up the Arkansas river forty or fifty miles, took a snag, and tried for a little while to remove it. In a short time they would run down again to the mouth of the river, and there lay up until they would have a chance to buy more supplies; and so they would go on. No service was done to the river; none could be expected, and the character of men who were put in charge of the improvement. The men were not those who lived on the river; and it was against the protest of the representatives of that State here that that class of men were in charge of the work; and the superintendent ought to have expelled and turned them off. This is the first opportunity I have seen coming up, when I could advert to it with propriety before this body. It was in this way that the money was wasted; and it was by irresponsible and unauthorized actions that the accounts were thrown into confusion. I do not know that relief should be given here by a special act; that these parties should be permitted to come in and settle their accounts in this way. To be sure, it takes nothing more from the Treasury; but they have expended what was appropriated in a manner inconsistent with, and actually contrary to, the provisions of the law.

Under the earliest representations that are made by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and also by the Senator from Mississippi, who has much knowledge of these matters, and by the Senator from Kentucky, I shall offer to the proposition of this resolution, but it affords me the opportunity to call attention to the manner in which these things are done, that some man who may occupy my seat hereafter may at least refer to the fact, and may call those who have charge of these things to a proper responsibility in proper time. I admit that I have not done so, and it is my fault that I have not done so; but it was in consequence of the want of knowledge or means to do it, until the whole appropriation that had been made had been wasted and expended, and it became useless to ask the question in the manner in which the appropriations for that river, in the first place, were trespassed upon by these officers and exhausted, and then the little remnant that there was wasted, as I know it to have been wasted, was entirely improper.

Mr. GREEN. I desire to ask the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF ARMS.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to call up a bill which has been under discussion several times and remained as the unfinished business—to authorize the sale of public arms to the different States and Territories, and to regulate the appointment of superintendents of the national armories.

Mr. GREEN. I desire to move in an executive session on a matter which is very important, but I cannot state it in open Senate. It will take but very few minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. Why not into executive session? I will close this bill, and then I will call up the bill.

Mr. GREEN. The matter I refer to must be acted on before the 4th.

The motion of Mr. DAVIS was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 45) to authorize the sale of public arms to the different States and Territories, and to regulate the appointment of superintendents of the national armories; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. HALE to strike out the second section, as follows:

“Sec. 2. And he is further enacted, That so much of the act approved August 5, 1854, as authorizes the appointment of a civilian as superintendent of each of the national armories, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and that the superintendents of these armories shall hereafter be selected from officers of the Ordnance Corps.”

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I will say for the benefit of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that I do not propose to make an extended speech. I do not want to submit a short argument, and I will state to the Senate that the argument I shall submit, every word of it, is extracted from a report made in the House of Representatives and signed by the gentlemen whose names are on the report, to-wit: R. H. Stanton, W. R. Rapp, Charles James Faulkner, and Joshua Vannant—a report made to the House on this very subject in 1854. That report says:

“From the period of their establishment to the early part of the year 1854, and through the vicissitudes of more than half a century, the national armories have been the seat of experienced and well-qualified civilians, appointed in the manner provided for by law of 1794. It may be safely said, that their management, in their organization, in the selection and extent of their products, they fully realized the highest expectations which had been formed of their capacity to meet the public necessities. It was not until 1847, when the Government was first called upon to supply the arms of forty-seven years from their first establishment, that any serious effort was made to supersede the civilians in charge, by the appointment of military officers, and the result was the appointment of military officers to the Ordnance Corps. The history of that transition from civil to military control affords strong reason to believe that success was owing more to the prevailing efforts and extraneous influences of the day, than to any merit or special advantages of that class of men for the management of such manufacturing establishments, or to any public necessity for a change of system.”

“The removal of the civil superintendents was made by the Secretary of War three days before the death of President Fremont, and it was a mere matter of convenience, and to have had no agency in it. The law having invested the President with the sole power of appointing the superintendents and other officers of the armories, the designations of military men for that purpose by the Secretary of War was a usurpation of power, and it became necessary to legalize it by an act of Congress; and accordingly, in 1854, such an act was passed, and the proposition, which first presented to the House, was rejected. It shared the same fate in the Senate; but subsequently, in the direct interference of the President, it was again introduced, and was passed by the Army bill as an amendment. When it came back to the House in this shape, it was again rejected, and only received a second reading, and then the House adjourned. A committee of conference, the House submitting to the wrong rather than jeopard the fate of the bill upon which it had been passed.

This report then goes on and contains reports made from time to time from various officers of the Army, who were never sent to examine it, and they report that they manufactured better arms under the supervision of the civilians than were manufactured in any place in the world, and also that every part of an arm manufactured at Harper's Ferry, interchanged, if that was the phrase of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, with those made at Springfield; that the prominent parts of an arm, the barrel, the part from Harper's Ferry and that from Springfield, and thrown into a basket, promiscuously could be taken out together and made a perfect arm.

Mr. DAVIS. What date was that?

Mr. HALE. Prior to 1842; prior to the change from civil to military superintendence. A report made to the House in 1839, by Mr. W. C. Johnson, which is embodied in this report, says:

“The most experienced transatlantic officers and artisans admit that the muskets and rifles now made in the United States are superior in point of finish and accuracy, to the best made in Europe. No perfect and improved has been the system adopted in our factories, that we have accounted for what a board of French officers pronounced a declaration that was impossible. They thought that it was impossible to make a musket that a part of the work made in one mould, and out of it the residuary part made in another shop or factory, and by different hands; that the springs and screws made to suit a given class could be made with the same precision and accuracy as the corresponding parts of a different lock. They thought that a part of the work made in one mould, and out of it the residuary part made in another shop or factory, and by different hands, could be taken a similar part of another, and make it interchangeable with all its uses, but that the aid of a mechanic must be employed to make the interchange, and that, in fact, it had been, the fact with the arms made in France, because the flings of the various parts are regulated chiefly by the eye. They thought that the precision and accuracy of machinery is reduced to such perfection that every part of a musket and rifle is made with such precision and accuracy, that every part of a musket and rifle is made for a purpose, with its every screw and nut that is made in each of the public factories. Take any part of a musket made in one mould, and out of it the residuary part made in another shop or factory, and by different hands, and every particular, like those parts made at Harper's Ferry. All the parts of two muskets may be taken asunder, though the barrels be made in one mould, and out of it the residuary part made in another shop or factory, and by different hands, and thrown into an indiscriminate mass, and there may be taken from the heap thus hindered, at random, the component parts of a musket and rifle, and these parts, if the musket thus formed will be as perfect as precision can be, although half the musket be made at one factory and the other half at the other.”

The comparison between the expense, they being much more economical under the civil than military superintendence, is also fully demonstrated by figures in this report, which I will not read. It is sufficient to say, that the cost is increased in this measure; but I will not read an extract on any other point, and with that I shall leave this subject.

“The very numerous complaints which have been made in many of our arms factories, and the oppressive conduct of the military commanders toward the workmen under their charge, are not wholly without foundation. Although the Government has not been able to produce arms for the last twelve years have not manifested this disposition to tyrannize over the workmen, it is, nevertheless, hardhearted to deny that the military officers in charge of the armories who have been in command, whose temper and learning, united with their professional habits of exacting instant submission to all the whims and caprices of the military authorities, and administrations especially offensive to the mechanics and others under them. The conduct of which complaint is not made in any of our arms factories, is the state of wrong and oppression, which may be seen and felt and described, but by many little acts of tyranny, which show themselves in the treatment of the workmen, in the orders, peremptory threats, and a thousand annoyances, which can only be realized and understood by those who are unfortunately subjected to them.”

Then there was another report, which I will not trouble the Senate with reading. This was in 1854.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Who signed that?

Mr. HALE. It is signed by the committee of the House in 1854, and the names are R. H. Stanton, W. R. Rapp, Charles James Faulkner, and Joshua Vannant. It is signed by R. H. Stanton, W. R. Rapp, Charles James Faulkner, and Joshua Vannant. That was the report made in 1854, and it was the result of very thorough examination, made upon complaints that were made by the manufacturers themselves.

I appeal to the Senate, and ask where is the propriety of putting a set of workmen engaged in the manufacture of arms under military superintendence? If a military guard is necessary to protect your property, put it there; but do not subject the men to military rule in doing their work. The argument that would put the manufacture of arms under military superintendence, and the necessity which is said to exist for doing it, to protect the public property from violence, is vastly greater in the case of the Mint. Why do you not put the Mint under the Army? There is more property there than there is in any of your armories, and it requires an exact work in mechanics; but it strikes me that it is entirely unnecessary.

Again, I sympathize with the objection made by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Pien.] the other day. I do not see what the Army has to do with all these pursuits in life. As was said, we cannot make an argument that we must get the Army to do it; we cannot build a Capitol but we must get the Army to do it; we cannot have a Senate Chamber, and shut out the air of heaven, and pump it up from the cellar beneath, but we get some of the Army to do it. I know some of the best practical experience of this Army work. You undertook to build a bridge over the Potomac river, within a very few years, and sent an officer of the Army to do it. I do not remember whether he built a bridge or not. Brodhead is now the chief engineer of the Committee on Military Affairs will remember; for I think he was Secretary of War at the time, and he can tell whether that bridge fell before the last stroke of work was put to it.

Mr. DAVIS. What bridge was it?

Mr. HALE. The bridge over the Potomac river, up at the Little Falls—Thom's bridge.

Mr. DAVIS. I will state to the Senator there was an officer of topographical engineers put in charge of the bridge, and he committed the great error of employing a third-rate engineer, one of whom the Senator speaks, and who had a peculiar construction of iron bridge, and that bridge fell down. Then Lieutenant Timm took care to build the next one himself. That is standing.

Mr. HALE. I am glad he did. He had to build a bridge that would hold a place, and he had to learn how to build one that would stand.

Mr. DAVIS. No; he let one of your practical men build it.

Mr. HALE. I think this is a thing that we should keep out of the Army. I believe that some officer of the Army to superintend the manufacture of our muskets, who knows them but that you will next make a great national workshop to manufacture uniforms, and, my word for it, you will then have an officer of the Army to superintend it. So, with all the tricks you want for the Army, there must be an Army officer to superintend their manufacture.

I know there is a repugnance in the minds of these mechanics against being put under military rule and military discipline in their work, and there is no sort of necessity for it. I believe they are all-powerful and always has been. I know it. I think the Army has influence enough. It has given us our Presidents again and again. It is omnipotent. I will let it have all the influence that nationally belongs to it. I believe we may have the great workshops, give the mechanics to their appropriate business without compelling them to work under military supervision. I have no prejudice against the Army, none at all, if they will keep within their proper place; but I say, in my humble judgment, that to put them under military rule is not necessary; and the experience of the Government from 1794 to 1831, according to the report of this committee, shows that they were getting along and progressing and making better arms than were ever made before in any part of the world. The most successful superintendent of the Army was the superintendent of a military officer in 1842. The military officer kept it about a dozen years, until his rule became so obnoxious, and this system to which you subjected these workmen was so oppressive to them, that they came forward here in no numbers from all parts of the country, sachemets, and laid their complaints before Congress; Congress did not proceed in a hurry, but they ordered a deliberate investigation into the facts; they were all brought before them; and by a very decisive vote, as the Journals will show, Congress reversed the action that was taken in the first instance by the order of the Secretary of War without any law, and went back to the practice that was established at the beginning of the Government. I think they did so wisely, and I think the Congress will do wisely, by standing here and reversing the action that has operated so well for the purpose of giving these works to the superintendence of Army officers.

Now, let me say to the Senator from Mississippi that I have said all I have to say; and I have not said it because I wanted to hear myself asleep, but I have said it because I think that the nation knows who do this business would feel that it was an impeachment of their capacity, and it was a subjection to discipline odious to them, if they are put under it.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire has presented, as an argument, portions of a report made in 1854, the facts of which I shall proceed at once to comment upon. Before I do so, however, I wish to notice some of the closing remarks of the Senator. He speaks of the Army as being all-powerful. He speaks of the Senate as possessing no discipline. These are not belonging to them. If the Army had power, if they had votes and representatives on this floor and in the other Chamber, I hardly suppose their rights would be invaded in the manner in which the Senator has put the New Hampshire process. If it be not the legitimate function of a military man to make the arms he is to use, I would ask of what can he properly take the charge?

But the Senator presents it, I think very unfairly, as a proposition to remove the workmen and their tools by military control. There is no such proposition in the mind of any one. Has there been a workman who was superintended in all the years the Senator has enumerated? No, sir; they are politicians; and it is because they are politicians that they have advocates. In the Senate, the then Secretary of War presented to his mind satisfactory, appointed a military officer superintendent. The Senator, relying on that report which he has read from, supposes no military man had had charge of the armory before. It is true, that to soldier before that had charge of the armory was understood, but the improvement in the arms up to 1830, to which he refers, was made by Lieutenant Colonel Talcott, residing at the armory and controlling all its operations. Without the appointment, he had charge of the armory, and he was understood to superintend the improvements were made.

Then, sir, in 1842 was adopted the new model musket, and now the Senator supposes the arms, anterior to that, were superior, let him go into the market and buy them, when, as condemned muskets, they were thrown aside and taken by George Law for trade in South America. It was subsequent to 1842 that the muskets were made which have fought the battles of the country, and which have since been remodeled and modified so as to make them percussion muskets, and are useful for the most part. It is understood that the defective weapons that we thought it improper to put them in the hands of the soldiers. They went on improving from that time; and under the military superintendence they attained that perfection which the report that the Senator read from claims at an earlier date, and which did not then exist.

Then, sir, for political considerations, as I believed then and believe now, a movement was made to displace these military superintendents. The clamor was not from the workmen, as has been asserted time and again without foundation. I chance to know something of the principal workmen who were then at Springfield, and I believe there was not one of them that desired the change to be made, so far as I have been informed, and I do not think it is probable that they would. With the change of superintendents they desire to see an officer of the ordnance corps sent back to take charge; not that they desire a military superintendent, but that they desire some man who has been trained so as to give him administrative capacity, that he may be released from the confusions which exist on an incompetent man taking charge of a great establishment.

No just conclusion is to be drawn from the operation of those establishments which are conducted by the capital owning them. There, mind and interest conspire to do the work. Here, you rely on the President and the Secretary of War to select some favorite politician, and put him in charge of the work, without the capacity that would ever acquire the capital that would establish a factory of his own; without the capacity that would enable him to administer it, if by chance he inherited it.

But I suppose I am to be pointed to the success which has attended the civil administration of the armory at Springfield. But a word is necessary to state the reason for that. Mr. Whitney was a man of common sense and practical judgment. When he was put in charge of the work, he knew that those men who had made it the study of their lives understood better what they were about than he could. He therefore changed nothing; he trod sedulously in the footsteps of his predecessor; and from that has resulted the administration of that armory which I admit has been successful. But he has left it. You may get another such man. The chances are greatly against it; and in proof of my position, turn to the other armory. We have but two. They have tried man after man at the other armory, and confusion has existed at it; and the same confusion has occurred here. I have been informed by an ordnance officer, whose position gave him the opportunity to know, that boasted excellence which once existed in our arms that all the parts would interchange, of any given model, was now so far gone in relation to the arms manufactured there that you had deteriorated, from the time you changed from a military to a civil superintendence, in the character of your arm. Are we never to recover this? It was found in a state of perfect administration; it was found in a state where the arms were better constructed, a condition that gave them that excellence over all the small arms of the world, and they have gone down from the day the system of superintendence was changed. That is sufficient evidence to me that we are to get worse and not better.

I know it is a great deal of military men as tyrants; but that man who is not by military education taught to control himself, taught to be kind to those who are under him, has some radical defect in his nature. A man of elevated soul, from the very fact that he commands those who cannot read, and who are ignorant of the increasing year, additional kindness to them.

But the Senator, the other day, repeated it as though graduates from the Military Academy were to be sent at once to take charge of the armories. We have but one Military Academy, and the officers, men whose heads are whitened in the service. I noticed the fling which the Senator made at the color of the military glove. We heard that before the Mexican war; but whose hands were deeper dyed in blood than those who came from the Military Academy? Whose hands were more besmeared with the smoke of battle than those who had been trained to the profession of arms? I had hoped their services in the field might have silenced the denigratory slant about white gloves forever. But the Senator argued, the other day, that the men who were sent to take charge of the armories, as he had examined the programme of studies, and as far as he could understand it, which fitted them to take charge of the manufacture of arms. Quoted conclusion—the study of mechanics not fit a man to take charge of the armory; the study of mathematics, the branch on which it improves, is not a state that goes beyond the mere senses; the study of natural philosophy, chemistry, and metallurgy—these not fit a man to take charge of an armory! What sort of an education, I would ask the Senator, then, would fit him for it? Does he intend to say that he must have learned the use of the file, the chisel, and the hammer? If he was to be put to work upon the parts of the musket, that would be true; but administrative capacity is what you require in a superintendent, and if he were the man to take charge of the armory, you would put him in charge of a great work like that, he could no longer use his own hands. It is heard, eyes, which he would require—the administrative capacity of the man; and that is independent of whether he has been a trained mechanic or not.

But, in fact, the Christian character of the superintendent determining the character of the workman in the armory which is nearest the residence of the Senator, he might find the master-workman, not by title and by place, but by employment—the old man Buckland, who has been there through all systems. It is his great genius that half the improvements made are due. It required a knowledge of arms to tell what was needed by the troops. It required buckskin to tell how modifications could be made in the application of mechanical contrivances to arms. They have acted in unison; and if the Senator can point me to an officer who has been on duty there since civil superintendents were there before, who will not bear testimony to the merit of that man, and who has ever failed to treat him with the respect due to his genius and worth, I would admit that half my argument is wrong. But I do not intend to consume the time of the Senate. I hope the subject is sufficiently understood.

Mr. HALE. I am not going to pursue this argument, but simply to vindicate myself against one remark the Senator made. I made no fling at West Point cadets—at the color of their gloves; not at all.

Mr. DAVIS. The other day—

Mr. HALE. I know what I said. It was only in answer to a suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN], that the education of these gentlemen peculiarly fitted them for discharging the duties of superintendents of these workshops.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not say they were fitted by the fact of wearing white gloves.

Mr. HALE. Of course, you did not say that; but what I said was in answer to the Senator from Maine. It struck me, I must say, with all my respect for the Senator from Maine, that the Senator from Mississippi, as a little absurd that an education at West Point peculiarly fitted them to take charge of these workshops; and I said that I thought these gentlemen would be employed in a work much more agreeable to the taste that they had acquired by the education at West Point, by having their hands in gloves and doing the duties of a ball-room rather than assisting grubby mechanics in making arms. That was all, I think. If there was not great wit in it, it was certainly harmless, and hardly deserved to be designated as a demagogical fling.

Mr. DAVIS. I'll use that expression towards the Senator. I assured him it was in no unkindness to him; and, as he says I did, probably it is so. I had heard it so often before that probably, when I reflected on it, the bitterness of former days came before me.

The question being taken, by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bingham, Candler, Dixon, Doolittle, Hendricks, Hale, Hoar, Hooper, Keim, McKim, Sumner, Treadwell, White, Wilson, and Withers.

NAYS—Messrs. Brady, Gray, Cleggman, Conger, Crittenden, Davis, Fessenden, Fish, Folger, Foster, Green, Grimes, Gurney, Hammond, Han, Humphreys, Towner, Johnson of Arkansas, Kennedy, Lane, Mallory, Mason, Nicholson, Poth, Powell, Rice, Salisbury, Sebastian, Sargent, Ten Eyck, and Wigfall—32.

So the Senate refused to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now move to strike out the first section of the bill, relative to the sale of arms. It is in these words:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War, and he is hereby authorized to issue any State or Territory of the United States, or any person or persons, arms made at the United States armories, such arms as may be spared from the public supplies without prior appropriation of money, and to sell the same, upon payment therefor, in each case, of an order of the President to the Secretary of War, by fabrication at the national armories, the arms so issued."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I believe it is in order to amend the section before taking the vote to strike it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foote in the chair.) It is in order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to amend it in the ninth line, by inserting, after the word "therefor," the words "in cash, at the time of delivery;" so that it will read:

"Upon the payment therefor in cash, at the time of delivery, in each case of an order of the President."

Mr. DAVIS. I am willing to accept that amendment. There can be no objection to it. It was what was originally intended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to suggest another amendment, after the word "amount." It now reads, "an amount sufficient to replace, by fabrication at the national armories, the arms so issued." I move to strike out the words "sufficient to replace, by fabrication at the national armories, the arms so issued," and insert, "equal to the cost of the same," so that the Government shall not dispose of its arms at less than their cost.

Mr. DAVIS. I think I can satisfy the Senator from Illinois that his amendment, if adopted, will be injurious and can have no beneficial effect. If the improvement of machinery should reduce the price of the manufacture of a given arm this year, it would be justice to the two parties holding the exclusive relation they bear to each other, to allow the State to take the arms at an amount which would replace it next year. Then, again, the Senator will perceive that in every change of model, there is a change of machinery consequent on the change of model; and thus you have arms which, upon an estimate made according to the scale of prices, would have a very different valuation in the armory, and exactly the same value out of it. There would be an amount of confusion resulting from it; whereas the bill is simple and direct, and gives exactly what is the value to the Government of the arm the State receives, as the language now stands.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My object in suggesting the amendment was to make it definite. It seems to me that now it leaves a very great discretion to the Secretary of War. He may say, "I will estimate what sum will be sufficient 'to replace, by fabrication at the national armories, the arms so issued.'" Here is authority given to him, on the application of the executive of one of the States, to issue such amount of arms as may not be for the public service, to the State, on condition that a sum is paid "to replace, by fabrication at the national armories, the arms so issued." How is that to be ascertained? It seems to me that leaves it very vague and uncertain; whereas the amendment I have proposed would leave a fixed sum; there would be no confusion about it; we could ascertain what the arms to be disposed of had cost, and that would fix the amount. I am not particular about it, however.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island to strike out the first section of the bill, as amended.

Mr. SIMMONS. There seems to be very little attention paid to the bill; but I should like to ask the Secretary of War, if he has any objection in entering into this new branch of business at the armories? I have not heard any reason for this. This proposition to go into the manufacture of arms for sale on the part of the Government, it strikes me, is a new idea.

Mr. DAVIS. I will give the answer that was given to the proposition to amend this section so as to fix some certain price. If anybody ever carried on the business of manufacturing any kind of machinery, of all things in the world he would never agree to fix it on any paper calculation of its cost. I never knew even a man who was thoroughly acquainted with business, who would make an estimate within twenty per cent. of what it would cost the next year. I recollect a rule which, when I was a farmer, a neighbor of mine thought it ought to prove for me to make the best calculation I could about managing my farm, what it would cost, and then set down the crop and what it would bring; and he said if I doubled the estimated cost, and took off half of what I thought the crop would bring, I should generally come out about right; and it is pretty much so with this machine making. If a man makes as close an estimate as he can of the cost of these arms, you might add twenty-five per cent. to it, and you would hardly ever cover the real cost. That is the case with all business. I never knew a business that cost any money that was a profit on paper when very little was actually realized; and of all things, if I were going to make these arms, I would rather set it down that we would take ten dollars for them if they cost twenty dollars, than let them go on an estimate of what they would cost others for.

But I am against the whole matter of the Government manufacturing arms for sale. If we are not dealing liberally enough with the different States, in furnishing them with arms, I am willing to give more money, and let us go on we now furnish them. We now give $300,000 a year for arms to the States. If that is not enough, I am willing to give more; but I would never enter into a competition with private enterprise by the Government. It is a most unheard of usurpation of power on the part of the Government. I am willing to manufacture for ourselves, but not to set up a business on the part of the Government, with its capital and funds, to run down private establishments that are competing with it. We have plenty of armories in this country, ready to make arms for anybody who will pay cash for them, as cheap as they can be manufactured; and if this Government, with its capital and funds, would establish to break down private enterprise, I think it is time we looked about it. It is a most unheard of competition. You want this Government to set up a competition with mechanics in making cheap arms, and to be sold on a paper calculation of their cost. I am sure that it would be a Senator from Mississippi. I know his notions are generally pretty rigid about this Government. He surely does not want this Government to compete with individuals in the ordinary transaction of business. You talk about monopolies. There never was a monopoly in England that would so mischievous in its consequences as to undertake to manufacture arms against private armories, and sell them on a paper calculation of their cost. I do not want to enlarge on this topic. I believe the subject is sufficiently understood.

Mr. DAVIS. I will endeavor to answer the inquiries put to me by the Senator from Rhode Island, and be brief. He asks me why we should take a paper calculation. I thought I had partly answered that before. I will merely say to him, however, that he has his own machine price, and the price of iron varies, and the cost of the arm will vary with the price of iron, the price of coal, the price of labor. That is known at the time you sell the arm, and your purpose is to replace the arm of exactly the same model and character as the one that you sell. I am sure that it would be by any means a difficult thing to come within no small a difference that it would hardly be appreciable.

Then, as to the other branch of the Senator's objection, which he seemed to press with the most force, that it was to put the Government into competition with private establishments, I will merely say that the Government has properly a monopoly in the manufacture of these arms, and that if you go to private establishments to buy arms, you are buying arms made by the machinery of the manufacture of. In this age of machinery we manufacture no arms by hand, save here and there, in some backwoods country, where a blacksmith makes a rifle. The machinery is applied to the arm which can be manufactured in any kind of a machine price, and individuals apply their machinery to such arms as have a general sale, not merely arms required for military use. No man establishes a factory in these days to make muskets and rifles such as are required in war. There is one establishment in Connecticut which has the machinery erected for the purpose of filling contracts with the Government, and it could fill an order from a State now for arms; but it is fair to the militia that you should put into their hands arms that had not the exact inspection and all the value which your public arms have. One makes arms for the militia.

Then, am I asked, why require the armories to sell them? The answer is twofold. We have gone on increasing in population, increasing in the organization of military companies, and we require more arms now than when the sum stated by the Senator, $300,000, was fixed. Consequently, appropriations are made from almost every State for arms, beyond the quota which the Department is authorized to issue. Volunteer companies are formed and desire arms. They call on the Governor, and he calls on the Secretary of War, and has but the stereotyped answer to make; the quota due to the State has been issued, and we can give you no more until another year's supply falls due. The Secretary of War this year has asked that the annual appropriation be increased to meet the increased demand for arms. It is a question, not an economic question whether you will allow the States to make appropriations for the arms they require themselves, or whether you will increase the appropriation beyond $300,000, which has heretofore been made. But, in this connection, would you give me 10 cents for the difference between the Government and the people, that on account of the negligence with which arms issued by the Federal Government to the States have been heretofore treated, I hope that more care will be exercised; that the arms will be better preserved when they are purchased by State appropriation, or by money raised by volunteer companies for the purpose; that we shall thus gain a care in the keeping of the arms, which will never be shown if the arms are issued by the United States in such quantities as may be required.

It would be an easy matter for the State to commit itself to engaging in general manufacture to compete with private establishments; but the manufacture of military arms is a peculiar one. No private establishment can afford to manufacture military arms, unless they have an order from the Government to justify them in erecting and keeping up the machinery. A large order from a State might warrant a manufacturer in establishing an armory, and making arms for sale to the State; but, as it is, we have the buildings, the power, the machinery in our public armories for the manufacture of more than double the number of arms which the present appropriation for that purpose would enable them to make. We now manufacture about eighteen thousand stand of arms per annum. The full plan of our armories would be about forty thousand. The difference between the number of that which the armories could make and the States and volunteer companies if they will pay for them. To increase the manufacture at the armories by direct appropriation, would be to add the Government with increased expense. I am opposed to that; I do not know what the Senator may take of the branch of the subject, but this is a mode by which we shall employ the whole machinery we have, the power and the buildings we have, without increasing the appropriations by the Government.

In the event of an emergency as the prospect of war or the existence of war, we should enlarge our appropriations, and then the Secretary of War, under the language of this bill, could sell spare. Then he would be bound under this language not to sell any, because there would be none to sell. Then your armories would be working to the full extent of their power under appropriations made by the Government. Such is not our ordinary and habitual custom. Such I do not believe to be desirable. We do not know how often we may change our models; and therefore it is not desirable to accumulate ready-made arms on any given model in our establishments. We have done well to increase their power to their present, or even it would be well to increase them to a greater capacity, to meet the exigency of war in the respect of arms. In the respect of peace it is not necessary. I do not know that I have answered the Senator fully. If I have failed in anything which is suggested to me, I will endeavor to answer.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not call for an argument in reply to me. I only asked for the fact whether we do not now distribute $200,000 worth of arms gratuitously every year?

Mr. DAVIS. I answer affirmatively to that; but the Senator must permit me, when he asks a question, to do something more than give a categorical answer.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator has made a very able argument in a very bad cause. I understand him to say that we have a monopoly in the manufacture of arms.

Mr. DAVIS. Not all arms.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, of the muskets used by the United States troops. I do not propose to disturb that monopoly. I am willing that the Government should manufacture for its own troops, or for the troops of the States, just as much as they would be paid for. I should like to know if we have got a monopoly as against private individuals in the manufacture of arms for sale? The Senator says there is one establishment that can manufacture precisely as well as we can.

Mr. DAVIS. I said there was one establishment that had the machinery which the rifle used in the United States service, and they have made very good rifles, and under inspectors of the United States they can make again. That is so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suppose they could make them if they did not have an inspector of arms.

Mr. DAVIS. I am not so sure that they would.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the inspector makes the rifle, and does not merely inspect it after it is made!

Mr. DAVIS. I am not sure that they would make as good rifles; but the difference is this; that, in the private establishment, the object is to make as much money as possible of the arm; in the public establishment the object is to make the arm as perfect as possible.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no sort of doubt that the theory of manufacturing by the Government is a great deal better than the theory of manufacturing by the private enterprise; but the result is that Government manufacture costs double. If there is even one establishment in this country that has machinery perfectly adjusted to manufacturing an arm equal to that made at the national armory, and there is a demand for it, there will soon be another one as good. There is no danger of their wanting competition, if there is a market for anything of that kind. I say if there is but one such establishment, we have no right to understate to interfere with its business by any monopoly of ours.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator say that it is now at work on this character of arms?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; for I do not know anything about it; but I say, if there is any one able to make it, and willing to make it, we should let it alone.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will say, with the Senator's permission, that there is a private establishment for the manufacture of arms in my country, which has worked for the gentlemen from Mississippi, for the army of the Confederacy; and, as they have, since then, to the amount of several hundred thousand dollars, for the British Government; and is ready to make arms of any pattern, and to compete with any establishment in the world.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no doubt of it but if there was none, I would undertake to set up one within a year.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator will pardon me, I will say the same in regard to Connecticut; that there are various manufacturing establishments in that State, which have the same character of work as the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HALE. We have one in New Hampshire that makes better than either.

Mr. DAVIS. There is one in Connecticut which has the machinery, and the establishment for the manufacture of arms, and the others have the same, but they are not prepared to make special arms. Now, once for all, I would say that, if the object be to make the States pay as much as possible, then I can understand the argument of the Senator; but if the object be to let the States do the thing which they are not doing as well as possible, then, as the Government has paid for its establishment, and has the power and machinery, it is right to let the people have the advantage of them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to their getting them as cheaply as possible. That is not my objection.

Mr. DAVIS. But they must cost more at private establishments.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a matter that is very much in dispute. I do not believe Government establishments are cheaper than private ones, and as much as it could have been bought for a private establishment. That is my experience; and I do not believe Government ever made a musket that they could not have bought for half what it cost them, if they had bids for it, and inspected it as closely as they now do.

Mr. DAVIS. I will merely state to the Senator that the record is against him, and that common sense is against him; because a man who has an establishment must have interest on his capital, whereas the Government has no charge.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have heard a great deal about the investments of the Government in building ships and making great improvements; but I say they cannot do anything as well as an individual can do it. Private enterprise has made more progress in the armory which the Government encourage it, instead of putting it under epaulets, and it will improve them still further. That is my opinion. I do not profess to have any common sense; I have not got up to that.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator did not understand me as claiming his common sense.

Mr. SIMMONS. I supposed he did. I do not know anybody else to whom his remark could apply, for I do not know anybody that happens to use quite as much of it as I do in the debates. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I happened to make an argument; and if the Senator's common sense does not exceed that of all other persons, I think his argument ought to change with what I have clearly shown common sense requires.

Mr. SIMMONS. I happen to think quite differently from the Senator. I think it is not common sense to suppose that this mode of conducting the public business, under public officers, is equal to private enterprise.

Mr. DAVIS. That is not my position; but that common sense requires everybody to understand that a private capitalist, who invests his money in anything, must have interest on it. If that is not common sense, what is it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will tell you. Common sense is, that when private capitalists have invested their capital, the Government should not interfere to take away their business from them. That is what I am objecting to. There are a number of these gentlemen that can make arms as well as this Government, and make them cheaper; and we propose to set up our capital, throwing away its interest, in order to break down their capital, and make them do it without interest; we go to compete in competition with them in the market.

Now, the Senator says that there is recently a great advance in the military career of the country; that the country wants more arms than are currently doing; that the Government has a demand on our establishments for the sale of arms. If we do not supply them, it will make a demand on the manufacturers who have establishments to make them. Now, I should like to know if it is the object of this Government, the intention of the Government, to underbid private capitalists in private enterprise, and undertake to supply the market with a manufactured article against private enterprise, because we have investments and can do without interest on them? That is what I object to. I say, when this Government undertakes to strike down the enterprise of the country, to work without interest, when individuals have to pay at least six per cent., it is time they should begin to think who is their competitor. I will not enlarge on this matter, because it is too plain a case to need argument.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, the Government of the United States has been manufacturing its own arms for a long period. As far as I understand the organization, besides manufacturing its own arms, it has heretofore appropriated, and expended, $500,000 of the State's money, to buy arms from private manufacturers; but it is obliged, for the safety of the country, to keep on hand a very large supply of arms that are not in immediate use. Now, the proposition of this bill is, if there are any of the States that want to make additions to the arms of the State, that they shall be allowed to obtain them from the Government by replacing in the Treasury the cost of those arms to the Government; and how is it met by the Senator from Rhode Island? That you will thereby require the Government to interfere with private competition in the State of Virginia, a proportion, within the last few days, $500,000, a portion of which is to be applied to the purchase of arms, and the residue to the manufacture of arms. I am sorry to say that the relation in which that $500,000 of the State's money stands to this Union has put them upon the necessity of arming themselves; and the appropriation will be continued from year to year, until they are fully armed and capable of meeting all resistance. I say that Virginia, within the last few days, has appropriated $500,000 of the State's money, a portion of which is to be used for the purchase of arms, and the residue for the manufacture of arms; and the authorities of the State of Virginia are required right off to erect manufactures on State account in Virginia, for the manufacture of arms. I do not know what the bill will be very costly. The State of Virginia will purchase any arms under it. I do know, as far as I am informed as one of her representatives, that she has had no part or lot in it of any kind. I do know that she is sending to Europe, to see at what rate she can purchase arms there. I believe she will be very cautious in purchasing arms from the quarter of the country from which that Senator comes. But if it should result that this bill passes, and the State of Virginia finds she can purchase from the United States better arms, or as good arms, as she can get in private competition in Europe or at home, she will be induced to take them from the United States instead of elsewhere.

But when the honorable Senator avers, as he has very roundly avowed, that private manufacturers can make better arms and cheaper arms than the Government of the United States can make, if he is right, the Government of the United States cannot come into competition with them in the market; because those who want to buy, unless they are deterred from doing so by the distance of the country to buy, will buy from those private manufacturers. Sir, if she could buy arms as good and as cheap as she can make them, the State of Virginia would not be, as she is now, creating a manufactory of arms within her own limits. She would not manufacture them, clearly, if she could buy them as good and as cheap as she could get them elsewhere.

The proposition, as I understand it, is that the Government of the United States, from the surplus of arms that it must of necessity keep on hand, shall distribute them more at large among the people of the States, than it can do under the present legislation, on terms that they shall be replaced at cost. And what reply is given by the Senator from Rhode Island? Why, that you are bringing the Government into competition with private manufacturers; and at the same time, he asserts that these private manufacturers manufacture better arms and cheaper than the Government. If that is true, there is no competition. If it is not true, then he would compel the States to go and buy from these manufacturers all inferior or a worse arm at a higher rate. At the very time that it is certainly the policy of the United States to arm the country, at the very time that the United States has large surplus of arms on hand intended to arm the country, either through its own armories or through the militia, and which the proposition is to replace to the Government the cost of those arms, I cannot understand that argument in any way whatever.

I know nothing about it, for I never had occasion to inquire into the subject; but it would not be very much whether you can trust private manufacturers as you can trust the Government manufacturer. I know that in the competition which results among the private manufacturers, not of arms only but of everything else, there is imposition in material, imposition in weight, imposition in fabric, which is never tested until it is used, and then it manifests itself too late. I was struck with that the other day, in the Senator's own country, in the fall of that mill in Lawrence, in Massachusetts—an immense building, in the hands of private manufacturers, that fell to the ground and crushed some two hundred or two hundred and fifty people, men and women. An inquiry was made into the cause, and I looked into it, not to a great extent, and it was said there that the cause of it was owing to the defect in the castings of the pillars of the structure. I do not say that might not have happened if it had been a Government work, constructed on Government account, but I say only what belongs to that human nature and to that good sense which no honorable Senator can ignore, and which would justify that the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, when I say it is manifested everywhere that private individuals, freed from public responsibility in manufacture, will manufacture in the cheapest manner they can, obtaining the same price, and in matters of so great importance as the arms of a country, there will be flaws, there will be defects that might be avoided but for the cupidity of the manufacturer, which never manifest themselves until it is too late. I do not mean to show any reflection on any professor of any kind, or by the constituents of that gentleman who would manufacture them, but I speak of that only as one necessary result in all private manufactures.

Now, I am not one of those who believe that because arms are manufactured under epaulettes they are not to be trusted. Mr. Pugh, in his experience of this Government, (and I have had some,) I know of no security which, for private honor, public responsibility, or pecuniary trust, is to be compared to the security that an officer gives by his epaulettes—better than any bond, better than any profession of any kind. I have seen it tested over and over again, and questioned over and over again, and I have not yet seen it wanting. I say, the security that is given by the epaulettes, by the commission which he bears from his country, and his responsibility under that commission, is the best I have ever known in this Government. I trust to that, in the manufacture of arms, for more than I would to the cupidity of private enterprise; and in doing that, I do not mean still to question the honesty of those men who are engaged in it in the slightest degree. I do not know the character of their souls; but if I were buying arms for the use of my State, I would rather trust the honesty of the security of the public responsibility of the Government in the manufacture of them than to the cupidity of the private manufacturer.

Now, sir, what is the proposition of this bill? What is the object of the Government in manufacturing arms? They must have very large supplies. I am informed by the honorable Senator who is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that there are some five hundred thousand arms at the United States armories, and they are manufactured there every year at the rate of four or five hundred thousand dollars' worth annually. Why? Our army is only eighteen thousand strong; they cannot use them. They are put by for future use, when the country wants them. In the meantime they are redundant. They are intended to supply the regular army, and through the States, to be given to the people of the States when they are in arms for the protection of their country. The proposition now is to distribute them on terms most advantageous to the Government, by replacing the cost of the arms. The honorable Senator would for instance, expose to the competition of private manufacturers. I cannot see the propriety of it, I am free to admit.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, if it were alleged that the establishments of the Government were to manufacture and supply the regular army, or the militia of the States, with the suitable number of arms, and a proper estimate were made of the expense of increasing that department, I should be ready to vote for it. If, on the other hand, it were alleged that the Senator from Virginia, on the authority of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that there are more arms now in the armories and the arsenals than are required for the public service, and it is deemed expedient to distribute them to the States proportionately, as an armory or arsenal, and not ready to entertain that proposition. But this bill is for neither purpose. The bill is precisely what the Senator from Rhode Island has characterized it. It is not to carry into effect the duty of the Federal Government to provide for the arming of the militia of the States. It is not for the purpose of distributing to the States public arms which are not necessary or not required by the Federal Government. It is to engage the Federal Government in the manufacture of arms, not with a view to its public duty, but to interfere with private manufacturing, or to create an opening for introduction to the second section; it is to find employment for the Army of the United States.

We first established the Academy at West Point, because, it is said, we must educate these gentlemen, who are the leaders and the chiefs, so as to find business for them after they are educated. They are not sent, the greater portion of them, as other armies in other countries are, to be soldiers. They are to be congregated in fortifications, and in cities, and in arsenals, and in arsenals, to be soldiers in name and not soldiers in fact. Now, sir, instead of allowing the manufacture of arms whenever unusual demands beyond the ordinary requirements of the militia exist, in order to answer these extraordinary demands, we need to bring the Government of the United States into competition with private individuals in a private business; and what is the argument for that? The Senator from Virginia says that if private individuals can make these arms cheaper and better than the Government, there will be no competition, or no dangerous competition, between the Government and private individuals. The Senator overlooks the fact stated by the Senator from Rhode Island, that private individuals must have an income or an interest upon their capital, while the Federal Government pays its money there without the idea of having any return, or any interest, or any income. You bring the power of this Government, as a capitalist requiring no return upon its investment, to compete with individuals who are compelled to receive a return upon their capital.

But the Senator from Virginia thinks that competition will ruin the manufacture of arms, and that men arriving with each other to command the market, to make the best article at the least price, will be sure to give us the worst possible article. Why, sir, the experience of the world is the other way. It is the experience of the world that monopoly gives us the worst article at the least price. I do not care whether it is a monopoly granted by a charter, or whether it is a monopoly of the Government of the United States, after she has driven out private individuals, and set up her own factories, under the control of her own military officers.

But the Senator from Virginia says the best security we can have that these arms will be the best and the cheapest, is the fact that they are to be manufactured under the administration of gentlemen who wear epaulettes. That is a better security than a bond. I believe I use the strongest possible expression. Then, sir, in God's name, why not give them every office in the Government of the United States? If it is good for one thing, it is good for all. I do not mean to deprecate the honor of military officers; but I say it is no higher than the honor of the man who wears a cap and a sword, and security at all. I can see no purpose in committing the matter to these gentlemen. They are not educated for any such business. They have no practical acquaintance with the manufacture of arms. They have no practical acquaintance with the management of the business of a factory. They will have to learn every bit of it after you have put them there. They have no qualifications, except that, perhaps, of inspectors, to form a judgment derived from their experience or observation in the Army as to the parity of pattern or quality of arms, or for superintending the manufacture of them, the pretense that they are educated for any such business, or that they know any such thing, unless it be an exceptional case, is preposterous.

It is, therefore, that this whole bill, whether you regard the first section or the second section, is equally objectionable. Each section is indispensable to the other. If you do not have the first section you will very soon find that the second section will be in little demand, for it will only be a means to the first section, and it will be but if you can set all the armories of the United States to the maximum of their capacity to manufacture arms, there will be more places for more officers. If you strike out the second section, the first section, unless it be to distribute the arms already made, would soon be of the least possible consequence. I look upon it, sir, without meaning any disrespect to the Committee on Military Affairs, as a part of that plan which seems to have been persisted in continuously, that to employ the Army of the United States in the Territories, or in any other department of civil service; and while this is being done on the pretense of finding them employment, the President thunders to us from the other end of the avenue that he must have three, four, or five more regiments added to the army for the Territories, and for the Territories. Let these officers go there. That is where they ought to be; and if they were sent there instead of being put over the Treasury extension, the Capitol extension, and the harbor improvement, and river improvements, and the armories, and the arsenals—if they were sent to the Territories, as the French troops are sent to Algeria, we should not have thence by Texas to give her regiments of rangers, and from all the Territories to give them either new regiments in the regular Army or new regiments of volunteers.

It is a very singular thing, that Army officers have less idea of being soldiers than of being everything else. They attempt, in every way, to get into employments that are not intended for them by the laws regulating, or originating, or organizing the Army itself—for one, since this matter was taken to attention in the States two years ago, I have recalled the solemn resolution that I will record no vote to increase, in any direction, the control of the Army of the United States in the civil departments of this Government. I shall vote for the only bill for the second section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate adjourn. I am satisfied that we cannot get through with this bill to-night.

mitted, if he asked for delay. If the Senator from Maine desires to offer an amendment, I shall not press the bill to a vote until he has done so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 1, 1860.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. R. P. CUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. ADRIN. I rise to a question of privilege.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of Patents, transmitting, agreeably to the design of Congress as indicated in the clause of the act of March 3, 1859, "for collection of agricultural statistics, investigations for promoting agriculture and rural economy, and the procuring of cuttings and seeds," the annual agricultural report of his office; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

CLERK'S ANNUAL REPORT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, presented to the House the annual report of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in relation to the disbursement of the contingent fund of the House; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT FROM THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, presented to the House the report of the Court of Claims, adverse, in the case of Sarah B. Weber, administratrix of John A. Weber, ex. The United States; J. Eddy's heirs vs. The United States; Charles A. Dubois De Loebe vs. The United States; and John H. Merrill vs. The United States; which were, under the rules, placed upon the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CARTER. I rise to a question of privilege. The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from New Jersey rose to a question of privilege?

Mr. ADRIN. I did.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from New Jersey is entitled to be heard first.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from New Jersey to yield to me a moment.

Mr. ADRIN. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I move that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the papers relating to the claim of the Methodist Episcopal Missionary Society of Oregon; and that the same be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ADRIN. I rise to make a personal explanation.

Mr. CARTER. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has recognized the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ADRIN. I rise, as one of the committee appointed by this House to make arrangements for the inauguration of the equestrian statue of General Washington, to reply to a resolution of the other body by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CARTER], casting a censure upon the committee appointed for that purpose.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I rise to a question of order upon the gentleman from New Jersey. It is, that this is not a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey rises to a question of privilege, and he will state it as briefly as possible.

Mr. ADRIN. My point is, that the official character of a committee of this House has been censured; and it is laid down in the Manual that, whenever that is the case, the committee, or member of the committee, may rise to a personal explanation.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I hope the gentleman will have the resolution to which he referred read, so that we may see whether this is a case which comes under the rule. If it does, I shall have no objection.

Mr. ADRIN. I have no objection to the reading of the resolution for the information of the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey will understand that the resolution to which he refers is in the possession of the House. It was offered, but, objection being made, it was not received.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have no objection to having this matter settled, if it is in order.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from New Jersey will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. LOVEJOY and Mr. FARNSWORTH objected.

Mr. ADRIN. I think it most unjust to the character of that committee, and unjust to the character of this House.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. ADRIN. That no explanation should be permitted where an unjust censure has been cast upon that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is compelled to decide, if objection is insisted on, that, as there is no resolution before the House, no question of privilege, such as that to which the gentleman from New Jersey refers, can be raised, and therefore he is not in order.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman from New Jersey complains of injustice, and therefore I will state the reason why I object. It is, that the gentleman from New Jersey may go on and make his explanation, and as soon as the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KEITT], another member of that committee, returns, he may rise to a question of privilege on the same subject, and address the House also. I think the subject had better be postponed until both gentlemen are in their seats.

Mr. ADRIN. I do not know that the gentleman from South Carolina, in his deep affliction, will desire to address this House. There is no evidence of that fact.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from New Jersey will be heard.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. LOVEJOY. How many times is it necessary to object before the Speaker understands that a thing is objected to?

Mr. ADRIN. I desire to say that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Keitt] is desirous that this matter should be brought up, and that I should be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is called for, which is the call of committees for reports. Reports are in order from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CARTER. I rise to a question of privilege. Certain remarks have been made in this House reflecting upon me, and I desire now to be heard.

Mr. PHELPS. I call the gentleman from New York to order.

Mr. ADRIN. I hope the gentleman from New York will be heard.

Objection was made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASHLEY DICKIN, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed an act (H. R. No. 3) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending June 30, 1861.

Also, that the Senate did, on the 29th of February, 1860, at twenty-three minutes of two o'clock, order the publication of the resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Kansas, in favor of a speedy admission of Kansas into the Union as a State, under the constitution formed at Wyandotte.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ADRIN. Am I entitled to the floor, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from New Jersey may be heard.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Ways and Means has been called for reports. That is the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business has been called for, which is the reception of reports from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PHELPS. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report back a bill with an amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Is there any objection to my stating my question of privilege?

Mr. ADRIN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CARTER] has risen to a privileged question for the purpose of enabling me to speak.

Mr. PHELPS. I object to all these proceedings.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from the Committee of Ways and Means.

ASSAY OFFICE IN ST. LOUIS.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back, with an amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 135) to establish an assay office in the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

ABOLITION OF LAND OFFICES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following resolution: That which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be requested to inquire into the expediency of abolishing a portion of the land offices of the United States, or whether the expenses of said offices may be reduced, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

OVERFLOWED LANDS ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I desire to ask leave of the House to allow me to offer a resolution for the appointment of a select committee to which may be referred the memorial of a number of citizens of Tennessee and Kentucky, in regard to the inundation of their lands on the Mississippi river.

Mr. HOUSTON. Send up the resolution, and let us hear what it is.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I would state that the memorial asks such action on the part of Congress as may be deemed proper; and, as the subject is not, perhaps, appropriate to any one of the standing committees, I desire that it may be referred to a select committee. The memorial has reference to the fact that the lands on the left bank of that river, in the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, have been overflooded, and great damages done by the building of levees on the Missouri and Arkansas sides, in consequence of the direct action of the Federal Government. This is the memorial of the citizens that have been affected thereby. I ask that it be referred to a select committee of five members.

Mr. COBB. I object to the introduction of that resolution, if the subject is to be referred to an apical committee. I have no objection to its going to one of the standing committees of the House.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. Very well; the objection comes from the right side of the House. This is just what I expected. [Laughter.]

Mr. AVERY. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw his objection.

Mr. COBB. I have heard the remark of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Eganston,] and I repeat that if the subject be referred to one of the standing committees I have no objection. If the gentleman can make political capital out of that, he is welcome to it.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. Well, I ask that the memorial may be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COBB. I have no objection.

It was so referred.

TENNESSEE RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. ELY, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, without amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 89) to liquidate the unjust contracts of the Tennessee river improvement; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM BROWN.

Mr. WALTON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William Brown; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN GREGG.

Mr. WALTON, from the same committee, presented an adverse report on the petition of Benjamin Gregg; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LYDIA FRASER.

Mr. HUTCHINS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Lydia Fraser, administratrix of John Frazer; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

ADVISEE REPORTS.

Mr. HUTCHINS also, from the same committee, presented adverse reports on the petitions of Chauncey Smith and Jennima Christian; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MARIAM G. VALLERO.

Mr. HALE, from the same committee, reported back a bill (C. C. No. 22) for the relief of Mariam G. Valero; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. GILMER. I am directed by the Committee of Elections to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be allowed to employ a clerk at a compensation not exceeding four dollars per day for the time actually employed.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not understand that to be a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is there objection to the resolution?

Mr. BURNETT. I object to it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is a privileged question. Mr. GILMER. I understand it to be a privileged question. Such a resolution has always been so considered. It certainly is a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not suppose it is a privileged question.

Mr. GILMER. But it is a report from the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. That committee has not been called to-day, and the Chair supposes that it is not, therefore, a privileged question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to say that the resolution offered by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina is a privileged resolution. It is a report from the Committee of Elections.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to the gentleman's argument. The question, I understand the Chair has decided that it is not a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so decided.

STEAMBOAT PASSENGER BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, House bill (No. 114) further to provide for the safety of passengers on vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, the further consideration of said bill was postponed till three weeks from Tuesday next; and the bill and accompanying report were ordered to be printed.

RHADS CALLAWAY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill for the relief of Rhads Callaway; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. In this the bill which was before the last Congress?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was understood to answer.

Mr. TAYLOR. It will be remembered that I presented a bill which was also before the last Congress, and which is intended as an amendment or substitute for this bill. If that bill of mine is not included in this report, I wish to ask permission of the House that the bill referred by me to the committee may be printed, in order that it may be in a condition to be brought up at the same time as the bill now referred to the Committee of the Whole House shall be brought up.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that course will be pursued.

It was so ordered.

STEAMBOAT PASSENGER BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a privileged question. I understand that the first report made by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce was postponed. To what time was it postponed?

The SPEAKER. It was postponed for three weeks.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to reconsider the vote by which it was postponed, with a view of saying a word to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] who is at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means. If the gentleman will look at the effect of this class of postponements, he will see that they are really special orders; and if the way is blocked up by bills being postponed, so as to give them an advantage over every other bill that may be reported from every other committee in the House, why the gentleman will find his appropriations bill stuck down to the very last day of the session, if they are passed at all.

I only make that suggestion. If he prefers to let it go so, I have indicated my disinclination to it; and I will be content with his course. I will assent him, however, if he desires to take the course I suggest—to keep the way clear, so that his appropriations bills may be passed at any time, without being sunk to the bottom by special orders and postponed bills. I, therefore, move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was postponed, and to have it referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend from Illinois will not carry this motion to reconsider over for an hour or two, until I can see what the measure is. I was called out, and did not bear it reported.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion to lay upon the table, for the purpose of a brief remark. This is a bill which is considered of great importance to the country, and that should be speedily passed. The gentleman from Alabama understands very well what will be the effect of referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and so doing will justify its being made a special order, will be disposed of with very little debate or discussion. It is a bill that has been most thoroughly considered.

Mr. MILLSON. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to ask me a question?

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to make a suggestion. My friend from Illinois knows that, from my first report, I have some familiarity with the bill which he has just reported. If the bill now reported by him resembles the bills formerly acted upon by the Committee on Commerce, I do not think that it will be practicable to discuss the bill in the House, restricted as the House will be to the consideration of a single amendment, or an amendment to that amendment, which will either involve the House in the predicament of allowing a senseless and tedious discussion to go on on those two amendments, or of cutting off all other amendments by a demand for the previous question.

One word more. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois in thinking that the bill is one of very great importance and that ought to be speedily and thoroughly considered by the House, and I think it would well justify its being made a special order; but I suggest to the gentleman that he allow it to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it can be discussed with more advantage and profit than it can possibly be acted on within the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If by the consent of the House it can be made a special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I am certainly very well agreed to that. All I desire is, that the bill may be in a position to be brought up by the House, if they desire to pass it, can act upon it.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that I hope he will stand by his motion, and let the bill be made a special order. It is a bill of importance, and one that ought to be considered by the House, and at an early day. That, in my judgment, is the only mode in which we can get action on it. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman will insist on his motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will now let the sense of the House, without further debate, by renewing the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman from Illinois withdraw that motion for a minute? I desire to put myself right in relation to this bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman can make his suggestion without my withdrawing the motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, it is this: the gentleman seems to have taken my motion—as did also the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERMAN]—as being evidence of hostility to the bill. It is not so. I am willing to take up this bill, and set upon it. I desire to do so. I know that it is an important bill, and that, in one shape or other, it ought to pass. I am not endeavoring to snuff the bill or to defeat it. I do not wish to see it in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to be obstructed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let me make a suggestion. The gentleman from Alabama knows very well that this is making no special order of the bill, and that the delay will come up at the time to which it is postponed; and that, at that time, a motion to lay upon the table or refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union will be in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, and to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If a majority of the House want to send the bill to that tomb of all the Capulets, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, very well; but it can be done as well on the day to which it is proposed to postpone its further consideration, as it can be upon this day. I hope, therefore, that the House will permit the disposition of the bill to be made that I have suggested.

Mr. HOUSTON. One word more, and I will detain the House no longer. I desire to reply in brief to the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and the gentleman from Kentucky. They say that, unless this bill is kept before the House, and not referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it will cease to command the attention and the action of the House; that otherwise, it will not be reached and disposed of this session.

If that be so, and it is to bury a measure forever to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, why, in the name of common sense, is not that committee abolished? Why do we have that committee, if it is of no avail? Why should it be recognized by our rules, unless it has some good purpose to subserve? Abolish it, if it is no good, and let all the bills of the session take their chance equally, be made special orders, and have their only consideration in the House. We are told gravely, in reference to the bill, that to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is to send it to the tomb of all the Capulets, and that the bill will never reach it; and I insist, if that be so, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is an incubus instead of a help, and ought to be abolished.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yielded only for an explanation, and not for a speech; and I insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the bill, I desire to introduce a resolution, under the direction of the Committee on Commerce, and which goes, under the rules, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and report be printed.

Mr. STANTON. Does that resolution come before the House as a report from the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It does; and it was adopted by the House. I state my rights I have here. The reason for the resolution is this: this, sir, is a very important bill, and the ordinary number of copies has not heretofore been found adequate to answer the demands made from every section of the country. It is a bill the pro-

Mr. LEACH, of North Carolina, objected.

Mr. ALLEN stated that he would have voted in the negative, had he been within the bar when his name was called.

Mr. SHIMORE said: I desire to cast my vote in favor of clerks to two or three of these committees; but I cannot vote for the batch of clerks proposed by the amendment; and therefore I vote "no."

Mr. McKNIGHT, I was called out of the House just before my name was called, and therefore missed my vote. As the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WINSLOW] said the other day if I had been here I should have voted correctly upon this question.

The result of the vote was announced, as above recorded.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROVINCETOWN HARBOR.

Mr. ELIOT, I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to make a report concerning the violation of Provinctown harbor, and to move that it be laid upon the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES KNAPP.

Mr. MOORHEAD, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Charles Knapp; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

ISAAC S. SMITH.

Mr. NIXON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Isaac S. Smith, of Syracuse, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

GEORGE R. JACKSON & CO.

Mr. CLEMENS, from the Committee on Commerce, made an adverse report in the case of George R. Jackson & Co.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ISSUING OF REGISTERS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report back a bill (S. No. 146) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue registers to the schooners Helen Blood and Sarah Bond, of Oswego, New York, and ask that it be put upon its passage. I make that motion.

The bill has been submitted to the Treasury Department, and has the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury. The hulls of these vessels were constructed in Canada, but the repairs and additions made to them in this country exceed double the value of the hulls. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof, the bill was ordered to be read a third time.

The bill was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF FEMALE PASSENGERS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back a bill, (H. R. No. 19,) and ask that it be put on its passage. This bill, sir, is a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855; and it is designed for the better protection of female passengers, and for other purposes. I say briefly to the House on this occasion, that this bill is based upon these facts: that in the course of the passage from the continent of Europe to this continent, female passengers are very frequently subjected to violation, by reason of the position of captains and other officers commanding on board of passenger ships. In order that the facts upon which the bill stands and is proposed may be known to this House, I send to the Clerk's desk, that it may be read, a representation of the Commissioners of Emigration of the State of New York. It is very brief, and presents the facts which were true at the time the representation was made, and equally true now. The memorial is signed by our first men in the city of New York.

The memorial was read, as follows:

To the House of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States:

Your petitioners, the Commissioners of Emigration of the State of New York, respectfully lay before you, That, by the law of the said State of New York, the care and protection of the emigrants arriving at the port of New York is committed to your petitioners; that, during the last two or three years, the frequent complaints made to your petitioners, by female emigrants arriving at the above port, of ill treatment and abuse from the captains and other officers of some of the vessels engaged in the passenger business, caused your petitioners to investigate the subject; and from such investigation your petitioners regret to be obliged to say, that, where the distinction in the number of cabin passengers in sailing ships, produced by the rapid stream competition between this and the eastern globe, and continental, property and decent observance on the part of the officers of many ships have very frequently been departed from; that, in relation to the high class of European ports, the captain frequently seizes some unprotected female from among his passengers, induces her to visit his cabin, and there, abusing his authority, and under the penalty by threats, and partly by promises of marriage, commits her to ruin, and retains her in his quarters for the rest of the voyage; the indifference of his fellow passengers, and the purposes of prostitution; that the other officers of the ship, having no apprehension for the commission of a common breach of duty with him, often intimate the example of their superior, and when the poor friendless women, thus seduced at this port, are thrown from the ship upon shore and abandoned to their fate, without any remedy for the past wrong which has been done upon them; that such occurrences as above described have become so frequent that your petitioners feel it their duty to ask for legislative interposition to put an end to these heinous offenses on the part of the officers of vessels; and for that purpose the acts being done on the high seas, out of the jurisdiction of the States, appeal to your honorable bodies, and respect-fully ask that your honorable bodies, by the enactment of laws as may prevent, by severe punishment for the act, the recurrence of this increasing evil and wrong.

Your petitioners will ever pray,
 G. C. Verplanck, Wilson G. Hunt,
 Andrew Curran, John C. Curtis,
 D. Mearns, John C. Canning,
 William Jennings, Elijah F. Purdy,
 Samuel S. Powell,
 Isaac Brodway,
 Daniel F. Tienman,
 Mayor New York.

Commissioners of Emigration.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported, as truly enrolled, an act (H. R. No. 3) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending the 30th June, 1861; when the Speaker signed the same.

SAFETY OF EMIGRANT PASSENGERS—AGAIN.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I should say that this memorial has the signatures of the first and most reliable men of the city and State of New York.

It is signed by the Mayors of New York and Brooklyn. The bill that has been prepared, and which I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back, has been very carefully considered. The subject was before the last Congress, and was brought before the Senate and another before the Senate; but on consultation, the two bills were abandoned, and that which constitutes the present bill was accepted in their place. It therefore has the sanction of the committee of the Senate and of the committees of the House. Under these circumstances, I send the bill to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have it read and put upon its passage; and upon that I demand the previous question.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York what is intended by the words, "for other purposes." Or whether the bill is confined to this one object?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. That is all. There is no other.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. (interrupting.) Has the morning hour expired?

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Let this bill be disposed of first.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am afraid that it may lead to debate; but I am willing to give way, so that the previous question may be seconded.

Mr. HOUSTON. We cannot have the previous question until after the bill shall have been read. If the gentleman from New York wants to keep his bill in condition to let it come to the morning, he can withdraw the previous question, and move to recommit the bill; and that motion, under the practice of the House, will bring it up.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I think this is a subject of much importance, and that the House will give at least five minutes to hearing the bill read.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think the bill is too long to attempt to pass it in this way. If the gentleman will move to recommit, it will come up in the morning; and we will have the morning hour in which to pass it.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I propose, for the benefit of the House and of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the bill be read and the previous question seconded; and then, the morning hour having expired, it may go over until tomorrow.

The bill was read. It enacts that every master, or other officer, seaman or other person, employed on board of any ship or vessel in the United States, who shall, during the voyage of such ship or vessel, or on board of such ship or vessel, or on the exercise of authority, or by solicitation or the making of gifts or presents, seduce and have illicit connection with any female passenger, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction, be punished by imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months, or by a fine not exceeding $1,000; provided that the subsequent intermarriage of the parties, seducing and seduced, may be pleaded in bar of a conviction.

The second section enacts that neither officer, seaman, nor other person employed on board of a ship or vessel bringing emigrants to the United States, shall visit or frequent any part of such ship or vessel that is assigned to emigrant passengers, except by the direction or permission of the master or commander; and that every officer, seaman, or other person employed on board of such, who shall violate the provisions of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit to the said ship or vessel his wages for the voyage; and that any master or commander who directs or permits any officer, seaman, or other person employed on board of such, to visit or frequent any part of said ship or vessel assigned to emigrant passengers, except for the purpose of doing or performing some necessary act or duty as an officer, seaman, or person employed, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine of fifty dollars for every occasion on which he shall so direct or permit the provisions of this section to be violated.

The third section makes it the duty of the master or commander of every ship or vessel bringing emigrant passengers to the United States to post a written or printed notice containing the provisions of the second section of this act in a conspicuous place on the fore-cabin, and in the several parts of said ship or vessel assigned to emigrant passengers, and on or near the mainmast, during the voyage; and on neglect so to do, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $500.

The fourth section enacts that in case of the conviction of any person under the provisions of the first section, and of the imposition of a fine, the court sentencing the person so convicted may, in its discretion, by an order to be entered on its minutes, direct the amount of the fine, when collected, to be paid for the use of the female seduced, or her child or children.

The fifth section enacts that no conviction shall be had under the provisions of this act, unless an indictment shall be found within one year after the commission of the offense.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I think the House is prepared to pass this bill now.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let me suggest to the gentleman from New York that I think twelve months' imprisonment is probably not punishment enough; and I think, also, that the period of twelve months, the statute of limitation established in that bill, is too short.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must renew my motion. Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Then I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and enter a motion to recommend the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I will state that it is my purpose to call up the Indian appropriation bill for the purpose of passing it.

EMPLOYEES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SPINNER. I hope the gentleman will allow me to offer resolutions which are of consequence to every one.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will hear them read.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the resolution of the House of Representatives, passed May 17, 1856, relative to the compensation of the Doorkeeper of this House and his employees is hereby rescinded, so far as the same conflicts with the joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress passed 26th July, 1854.

Resolved, That so much of said resolution as limits the number of pages to twelve be, and the same is hereby, repeated; and that the Doorkeeper be authorized from time to time to employ, under the direction of the Committee of Accounts, not exceeding twenty pages, between the ages of ten and sixteen years, at a compensation of two dollars per day for each during the session of Congress; and that the Committee of Accounts be authorized to allow pay to the pages acting during the pending of the election of Speaker of this House.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object to the resolutions.

Mr. SPINNER. I desire to say to the House that there are a large number of persons here who cannot go home for want of their pay.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, let them stay.

Mr. RUFFIN. We got along well enough last session with twelve pages; better than we did when we had more.

Mr. SPINNER. Were they twenty last year, and it is those persons we want to pay.

DIFFICULTIES ON THE FRONTIER.

Mr. CURTIS. I again ask leave to offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio consent?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection, if no one else has.

The resolution was then read, and by unanimous consent agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public service, to transmit to the House copies of any official correspondence which the Department has recently had with Governor Houston and others, concerning difficulties in the southwestern frontier; and also that he inform the House what measures, if any, have been taken to protect our citizens and preserve the peace of the country; that he be informed whether orders have been issued authorizing his troops to enter any of the States of Mexico; and if so, what copies of such orders be transmitted to us, with all official communication relating to the matter, in possession of the Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew my motion.

NAVY-YARDS.

Mr. MORSE. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw that motion for a moment, while I can offer a resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. There will be no need to this thing; but I will not be standing objection. If no one else objects, I will not.

Mr. MORSE. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to transmit to this House the evidence taken by the board of Navy officers for investigating the condition of navy-yards, as well as the report based thereon, and which was recently called for by resolution of this House.

Mr. THOMAS. I object.

Mr. MORSE. Let me say to the gentleman who objects, that last fall the Secretary of the Navy appointed a board of Navy officers to visit the several navy-yards and look into their condition. They reported. We want to know whether this House will come to the same conclusion on a bill for the correction of abuses as the board of Navy officers did, and we want the evidence upon which they based their report. That is all.

Mr. WINSLOW. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs if a resolution has not already passed the House asking for this information?

Mr. MORSE. I offered a resolution calling for the report, but that resolution did not embrace the evidence upon which that report of the Navy officers was based. This resolution calls for that evidence.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. WINSLOW. I think that is right.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now insist on my motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and then the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. (Mr. WASHINGTON, of Illinois, in the chair.)

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up House bill No. 216, making appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Ponca Indians, and with certain bands of Indians in the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington, for the year ending June 30, 1860.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ASHMORE. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill will take very little time.

Mr. ASHMORE. Well, then, I will make no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina will retain his right to the floor after this bill is disposed of.

Mr. ASHMORE. Very well, sir.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with, and the Clerk proceeded to read the bill by clauses for amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. Do I understand that the bill is now being read by clauses for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. MAYNARD. No amendments will be in order unless it is proposed before a section is passed from.

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment will be in order unless it is proposed before a section is passed from.

Mr. MAYNARD. I understood the Chair to request the gentleman from South Carolina to suspend his remarks until the bill was read. If we offer amendments to the bill, and debate it, the gentleman from Ohio kept off the floor for hours.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina has the floor upon the President's message. This bill, I think, will pass without objection. It is simply to carry into effect existing treaties with Indians, which were ratified in March last by the Senate by a two-thirds vote. The appropriations are required immediately.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the bill conform to the estimates of the Department?

Mr. SHERMAN. Precisely.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means upon what basis these several sums are reported?

Mr. SHERMAN. They are based upon existing treaties all of which I have in my hand, and which the gentleman can find by reference to his book of estimates.

Mr. MAYNARD. Are there no appropriations interpolated into the bill excepting these?

Mr. SHERMAN. There are not. On the contrary, the Committee of Ways and Means refused to insert any of $10,000 on account of what they regarded as an erroneous construction of one of the treaties. I believe that is the only variation in the bill from the estimates sent in by the Department. These are appropriations for this fiscal year, and not for the next fiscal year. They are to carry into execution treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes ratified on the 9th March last. These appropriations would have been made at the last session of Congress; but the treaties were not ratified until after the adjournment of the House.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill until the following paragraph was reached:

For the erection at suitable points on the reservation of one saw mill, one flouring mill, a building suitable for a hospital, two school houses, one blacksmith's shop, one harness and plow makers, and one dwelling for each, per four articles treaty 9th June, 1855, $100,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend that paragraph by inserting after the words "plow maker" the words, "one carpenter and joiner shop." The words were accidentally left out of the bill.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, I desire right here to put myself in the position I desire to occupy on this and the other appropriation bills that may be presented for the action of this body. I am aware that at two o'clock, the special order for the election of Printer will be taken up, and that I shall have but a very brief space in which to say what I wish to.

While it seems to be the fixed and inexorable policy of the House of Representatives to adhere to and prefer members of the Republican party and a good many of the members of the Democratic party, to exclude the entire population of the southern section of this Union from the right they have, by all reason and common justice, to carry their property with them into any and every State, of, not the North or the South, but of the United States, Territories acquired by our common blood and treasure—a fact which I am satisfied by the clear indications of the times—I am determined upon all these measures of appropriation, to make opposition to their passage, until that rule and unfair policy has been abandoned. This Government has expended over seven million dollars for territory, from every foot of which the South and southern institutions will be excluded, if that rule is adhered to. Hereafter, no territorial acquisitions for other property to be acquired, and I shall insist that the question of our rights shall be decided, and those rights admitted; and not only admitted, sir, but enforced. I will not vote to appropriate one more dollar until the right of citizens of our Southern section to carry their property with them into the Territories of the United States their slave property.

Mr. ASHMORE. I am entitled to the floor; and I yielded to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in order that this Indian appropriation bill might be taken up and pass upon its passage. I yielded, sir, for no such purpose as a general debate on this bill; for if there is to be debate, then I claim the floor, and shall proceed to make the remarks I design submitting to the House, that my position may be understood.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is to be no debate, I consider that I am bound to move that the committee rise. I make that motion.

Mr. COBB. I will vote against this bill in all its stages.

Mr. BRANCH. I hope that the gentleman from Ohio will not insist on his motion that the committee rise; but that he will move that this Indian appropriation bill be laid aside, and that the President's message be taken up, in order that my friend from South Carolina (Mr. Ashmore) may proceed with his remarks to-day, and at this time, as it is his desire to do.

Mr. SHERMAN. The House has made it the special order that to-day, at two o'clock, it would proceed to vote for a Printer, and that order must be executed. After the House has voted once or twice, and the House has been satisfied that no election can take place to-day, I will then move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order to take up the President's message; may be taken up and the general debate proceed with it. I think that now the committee will rise in order that we may go to the special order.

Mr. ASHMORE. I hope not; for, sir, if I am to have the floor, I would like to have it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina will have an opportunity to make his speech after we have voted for Printer.

Mr. ASHMORE. If we go to the election of the Printer, we must be called the House, and we cannot get a vote for Printer until late in the day.

The question was taken; and Mr. SHERMAN's motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly a bill H. R. 216, making appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Ponca Indians, and with certain bands of Indians in the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington, for the year ending June 30, 1860; and had come to no resolution thereon.

ELECTION OF PRINTER.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the execution of the special order for the election of a Printer.

Mr. BRANCH. I move that there be a call of the House.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINSLOW. I move that the further consideration of the special order be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us first have one vote.

Mr. WINSLOW. I withdraw my motion for the present.

The roll was then called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Meena, Ashley, Beale, Brayton, Brown, Burch, Burroughs, Horne, F. Clark, Clark B. Cochrane, Cooper, Deane, Wagner Davis, Delano, Duffell, Fenton, Feltz, Foulke, Frank, Harnden, Haskin, Hutchins, Kett, Kew, Kunkel, Lamar, McClelland, Montgomery, Lohan T. Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Palmer, Pettit, Potter, Pryor, Rust, Searson, Spaulding, Janow A. Stewart, Strout, Thayer, Wade, Webster, Whittier, Wood, and Woodard.

Pending the call,

Mr. ROBINSON, of Rhode Island, stated that his colleague, Mr. BRAYTON, had paired with Mr. McCLELLAND.

Mr. NIXON stated that his colleague, Mr. STRATTON, had paired to-day with Mr. SPOFFORD.

Mr. NIBLACK stated that he was paired with Mr. ASHLEY.

Mr. REYNOLDS stated that Mr. BEACH was paired with Mr. HASKIN.

Mr. WILSON stated that Mr. BRADDOCK was paired with Mr. HARRIS.

Mr. ALLEY stated that his colleague, Mr. DELANO, had paired with Mr. FORKE.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that Mr. FENTON was paired with his colleague, Mr. MACLART, Mr. FENTON having been called home by the severe illness of his mother.

Mr. TOMPKINS stated that Mr. FERRY was paired with Mr. COOPER.

Mr. KILGORE stated that Mr. FRANK was paired with Mr. GARNETT.

Mr. MILES stated that his colleague, Mr. KAY, was paired with Mr. DRELL.

Mr. KILGORE stated that Mr. READMAN was paired with Mr. HORACE F. CLARK.

Mr. BARKSDALE stated that his colleague, Mr. LAMAR, was paired with Mr. POTTER.

Mr. JUNKIN stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. MONTGOMERY.

Mr. McKNIGHT stated that his colleague, Mr. WOOD, was paired with Mr. MOORE, of Kentucky.

Mr. CASE stated that his colleague, Mr. PERRY, was paired with Mr. GEARLES, until both are returned to the city.

Mr. WINSLOW stated that Mr. RYAN was paired with Mr. PALMER; Mr. PAVOR was paired with Mr. SCRANTON; and that Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, was paired with Mr. WADE.

Mr. CLARK stated that his colleague, Mr. THEAKER, was confined to his room by illness, and that he was paired with Mr. PENDLETON.

Mr. BRANCH. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that gentlemen have absented themselves from the Hall, under the impression that no vote would be taken for Printer to-day. I hope, therefore, that a motion will be entertained for the postponement of the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow at one o'clock. We can go into committee, and hear the speech of the gentleman from South Carolina. [Cries of "No!" "No!" from the Republican benches.]

Mr. FLORENCE. I trust that there will now be an effort made to elect a Printer. If we cannot elect on the first vote, I then will be willing to agree to a postponement of the subject until to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I believe that this interruption of the public business ought to be put a stop to at the earliest moment practicable. I think it is our duty to take a vote to-day for Printer.

Mr. BRANCH. I will remind the gentleman that hardly two thirds of the members of the House are present. Further proceedings under the call of the House have not been dispensed with. I ask that the absentees not paired be called.

The SPEAKER stated that no pairs had been stated for Messrs. CLARK B. COCHRANE, CRAW, KUNKEL, ISAAC N. MORRIS, SPAULDING, WESTER, and WHITTIER.

Mr. BRANCH. There are five members of this side absent without pairs. The gentleman from South Carolina was entitled to the floor in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but he yielded it to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in order that the Indian appropriations might be taken up. Under the circumstances, therefore, I think this subject of the election of a Printer ought to be postponed until to-morrow, at one o'clock, and that we ought to resolve ourselves into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that the gentleman from South Carolina may have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. McKNIGHT. If we adjourn the question until to-morrow it may then be as it is now.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, all further proceedings under the call of the House will be dispensed with.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BRANCH. I am confident that the gentleman who is absent did not know that there would be a vote to-day for Printer. I was not aware of it until recently myself. The belief was, when we resolved ourselves into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that we would remain there all day; and under that belief, I have no doubt, members are not here.

Mr. MAYNARD. I left under that impression, and am now in the Hall only by accident.

Mr. BRANCH. I hope that my proposition for a postponement will be agreed to.

Mr. KILGORE. I hope this motion will be withdrawn. Gentlemen may not be tired of having this matter hanging upon our hands, and intentionally absented themselves.

Mr. BRANCH. I am quite sure that such is not the fact, in reference to the members absent on the other side. I have no doubt, under the impression that the day would be consumed in debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. KILGORE. The hour of two, to which this election was postponed, is now passed; and if gentlemen are here here, it is their own fault.

Mr. FLORENCE. We can send for absent members.

Mr. HOUSTON. I presume it was not generally known that the subject of the election of a Printer was postponed to one o'clock to-day. I do not believe my colleague [Mr. CRAW] was aware a vote was to be taken to-day. I did not know myself, until a few moments ago, that two o'clock was fixed as the hour when the vote was to be taken. Under the circumstances, I think that the further consideration of this subject ought to be postponed until to-morrow. I take it for granted that the other side will hardly press a vote this evening.

Mr. KILGORE. Members ought to have known that there was to be a vote.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is not true; and the gentleman from Indiana and myself ought to know a thousand and one things which neither of us knows anything about.

Mr. KILGORE. We ought to know what our duty is.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman ought to know his duty; and if he does know it, he ought to be striped with many stripes, for he is constantly violating his duty.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not violate it a hundredth part so much as the gentleman from Alabama does.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is living in open violation of the rights of his country, by making encroachments upon another part of the country.

Mr. KILGORE. I commit no violation of the laws of my country.

Mr. HOUSTON made some reply, which was entirely drowned by cries of "Order!" "Order!"

Mr. BRANCH. I call the yeas and nays upon my motion to postpone.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to make a very brief statement, with the consent of the House. On yesterday afternoon, I yielded my right to the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GAWW.] with the distinct understanding that I should occupy the floor to-day. Again, sir, this morning, at the instance of the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. SURAMAN.] I yielded my right to the floor to enable him to take up an appropriation bill for the payment of money due to Indian tribes under treaty stipulations—some of which was due under treaty stipulations ratified by the Senate on the 9th of March last. I yielded it with the hope of expediting the business of the country, and placing myself right upon the record before the country, but with the understanding that I was to have the floor immediately after to deliver the few remarks I desired to submit to the House. I supposed that the consideration of this bill would not consume more than ten or fifteen minutes. More than half an hour was consumed, and then I appealed to the gentleman to allow me to proceed. But by some means, I do not know how, I was deprived of the floor. I would like to speak this morning, and, if the House will do me the kindness to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and permit me to deliver my remarks, I shall be much gratified; but if they will not, I shall not attempt to speak to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am glad to see the gentleman from South Carolina, stating that I desired to take up an appropriation bill and pass it; but I told him at the same time—and he will bear witness to the truth of my remark—that at two o'clock the special order, the election of Public Printer, would come up, and I should not urge more than one vote to-day, if no election was made; that then it would be three o'clock; that after one vote, I had no doubt we would go into committee, and he would have the floor to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. ASHMORE. I stated to the gentleman, in reply, that I had objection to it; but that I would waive it all, and—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It was the understanding that the gentleman from South Carolina should have the floor, and as some members on the other side are absent, and they are not ready to vote to-day, I suggest that, by unanimous consent, we go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and afterwards come into the House and proceed with the election.

Mr. BRANCH. I am quite confident that the gentleman understands that that course shall be pursued. I am willing to withdraw my call for the yeas and nays, and let my motion to postpone to one o'clock to-morrow pass.

Mr. HOUSTON. Do I understand, then, that gentlemen upon the other side of the House will forgo all filibustering, and go into an election an hour hence?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will say to gentlemen upon the other side of the House, that Mr. CRAW, of Alabama, is not in the House, and I believe the gentleman from Delaware, Mr. WHITELEY, is also absent from the city. They will not probably be here to take their seats to-day, and therefore I shall oppose any arrangement of the sort. If gentlemen on the other side are determined to press a vote upon the House, they will consume an hour, must take the responsibility. I make no agreement to go into an election in an hour.

Mr. BRANCH. Then I insist upon my call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask if there is any objection upon the Democratic side of the House to this proposition to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for an hour, and then come out of committee and vote for Printer? I wish to know, so that we may be satisfied whether we are to have a vote to-day.

Mr. BRANCH. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will say that some few members of the House upon this side are absent, unpaired, and we cannot do justice to ourselves and the country by attempting to go to committee but an hour to-day. We have no assurance that those gentlemen will be here.

Mr. CLEMENS. It must be apparent to this side of the House that nothing can be accomplished by pressing a vote to-day. It is now three o'clock; the yeas and nays will consume but an hour; a call of the House will consume another half hour; then it will be four o'clock; and by the filibustering motions which will be resorted to upon this side of the House, an election can be prevented, and will be prevented. Now, I submit to the other side of the House this consideration; whether they will not expedite public business by yielding to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ASHMORE], who certainly has not been wanting in courtesy to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who is the acknowledged leader upon this side of the House? I suggest, as a matter of course and good feeling, that nothing can be gained by pressing a vote to-night. We can allow the gentleman from South Carolina to occupy the floor; and, by general consent, I am willing, so far as I am concerned, to discontinue this matter at a time to-morrow.

Mr. KILGORE. Is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. KILLINGER. Then I object to it.

Mr. BURNETT. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon this motion to postpone; and all of this discussion is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that this whole discussion is out of order. Nothing is in order but the motion to postpone; upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of the roll; but was interrupted by Mr. BRANCH. With the consent of the House I will say that I have been assured that perhaps an agreement may be effected by which the election may be postponed until to-morrow, at one o'clock, with the understanding that, at that time, no dilatory motions shall be made further than a call of the House, to see if members are present. If that can be done, and the House will give its consent, I will withdraw my demand for the yeas and nays, and let the vote go upon the motion to postpone to one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FLORENCE. I should have no objection to that, but to-morrow is the first private bill day of the session, and we ought to go to work upon the Private Calendar immediately. If we could elect upon a single day, I think I should object. I will not, however, object at this time, as gentlemen around me seem desirous that some arrangement should be made.

Mr. BRANCH. With the understanding I have stated, I propose that the yeas and nays be dispensed with upon the motion to postpone.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to the postponement until to-morrow. If it is to be postponed at all, let it be postponed until next week.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will continue the call.

The Clerk then resumed the call of the yeas and nays.

During the vote,
Mr. QUARLES stated that he was paired off with Mr. PEXTER, on the question of the election of Printer.

Mr. NIBLACK stated that he was paired off, on the question of Printer only, with Mr. ASHLEY.

Mr. WILSON stated that Mr. BOYCE having business to transact out of the House, he had paired with him for the remainder of the day.

Mr. PENDLETON stated that his colleague, Mr. THACKER, was confined to his house by indisposition, and, at the request of his friends, he (Mr. P.) had paired off with him for to-day on all questions connected with the election of Printer.

Mr. KILGORE. I rise for the purpose of moving to dispense with the reading of the roll, and to renew the proposition made by the gentleman from North Carolina, to agree upon a day for proceeding to an election. Gentlemen assure me—and I know the facility with which they do so—that they will not have any other vote on this question to-day; and I, for one, am now ready, and hope it may be assented to on this side, to agree to postpone the election of Printer until to-morrow, at one o'clock, with the understanding that it is to be taken up at that hour and disposed of.

I do not want gentlemen on the other side to sit still while this proposition is being made, and to say to-morrow that they do not feel themselves bound by it—that it was a mere agreement between the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BAXTER) and myself, and one or two others. I want them to take notice now that I shall hold them bound by their silence, unless they make objection.

Mr. BRANCH. I hope the proposition will be assented to on this side of the House.

Mr. FLORENCE. I sincerely trust it will be.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to know from my colleague whether he speaks by authority, and whether he is the actual leader of that side of the House. For the first few weeks of the session I was induced to think that my colleague was the leader of the opposition ranks, and that what he spoke was spoken by authority; but some six weeks since a severe cold, under which led me to believe that he was dropped from his leadership. We have not heard of him as a leader since then; but to-day again he seems to loom up as a leader. Now, I want to be informed what relation this colleague bears to the party on the opposite side of the House, so that we may know whether that side of the House will be bound by his arrangements.

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman from North Carolina and myself act as leaders on this particular occasion. I am very sorry to find that my colleague has become jealous. I believe he has never had the honor of being recognized as a leader in any place. There is another remark which I desire to make here. It is, that since I quit leading on this side of the House, I am inclined to think that it has been very badly led. [Laughter.]

Mr. NIBLACK. Not at all jealous; for I never aspired to lead here or anywhere else, and especially here. I am only trying to take my colleague's part, for I felt that he had been heretofore neglected.

Mr. BRANCH. I say in response to the gentleman from Indiana, that I have conferred with a number of gentlemen on this side of the House, and it is the general opinion that if the election be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock, we will first go to the vote without any further delay than that which is necessary to have one single call of the House. I hope that will be the understanding on all sides of the House.

Mr. FLORENCE. I trust sincerely that it will be.

Mr. BRANCH. And if to-morrow any members on this side should strive to prevent a vote, we will be strong enough to vote them down, and to bring on the election to-morrow.

Mr. KILGORE. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina withdraw his motion to postpone?

Mr. BRANCH. The motion to postpone must stand in order to bring up the question to-morrow; but, by the unanimous consent of the House, I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and the question on the record of the vote.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the yeas and nays will be withdrawn, the vote canceled, and the election of Printer postponed, with the understanding that it will be taken up to-morrow at one o'clock.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act (S. No. 66) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to receive and register to schoolmaster Hebert Blood and Sarah Blood, of Oswego, in the State of New York; when the Speaker signed the same.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The yeas were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the President's annual message, and of the resolutions to refer the same; on which Mr. KILGORE, of North Carolina (Mr. ASHMORE) was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ASHMORE. Mr. Chairman, I have neither been my wish nor my purpose to engage in elaborate discussion. My experience has taught me that it is not those who engage most frequently in discussion, or who are most apt to indulge in philosophical or abstract principles, nice-apron theories, and philanthropic sentimentalities, that are always found most useful in deliberative assemblies. It is rather the practical man, who, with quick perception, ready ingenuity, and salient wit, sizes up the strong points of a case, and makes them subserve the practical purposes of life by molding measures and policies based upon living, practical, correct principles, to the necessities of the times and of the age in which he lives. I do not wish it to be understood, however, that I am one of those who ignore correct theories. The one is as necessary to the other as the sun is to the day. I only mean to say that, in being questioned upon living practical philanthropy, and theories, to others, mine is, and has ever been, the sphere of practicality. I have regretted, sir, for many years past, that the all-absorbing and exciting subject of slavery could not be, and had not been, extended from discussion in the Halls of the Federal Congress. These reports are none of so avail. The question is upon us, and is absorbing all others. We have got to grapple with it, and to reduce it to a practical and satisfactory settlement in the Union, or it is to prove the breaker upon which the ship of State will be shattered into a thousand fragments.

Can such a settlement of so momentous a question be effected in the Union, and the rights and equities of all the States be preserved under the existing Constitution? I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I have lived in constant anxiety, and in the history of our country, when I see but little hopes of that. The radical differences of opinion that exist between the northern and southern people on this exciting subject have reached a point that has brought out and developed the angry passions of both sides, and the result has been a series of harsh opinions and sentiments of the other as mere exaggerations, in which there is little sincerity and less honesty.

Designing politicians, hypocritical philanthropists, crafty statesmen, and corrupt politicians, with their hosts of unscrupulous partisans, on all sides, have succeeded in exacerbating parties and sections until there is no longer a particle of confidence or harmony between them. As a southern man, I have looked upon this growing distrust, and also the feeling of antagonism and acrimony, with the darkest forebodings for the future of this country. For years past I have indulged the hope that some combination of fortuitous circumstances would arrest this condition of things. But, sir, I have been most sadly and seriously disappointed. I have seen the country, and the people, in the pregnant question arises, whose fault is it? I must confess that my intellect is too obtuse to perceive that the people of the South have ever demanded, or do now demand, anything more than their constitutional rights on the subject of slavery. I do not desire the extinction of any country, and I find in its premise that it was created "to establish justice and secure domestic tranquility."

In section two, article one, of that instrument, I find slavery recognized, and a representation provided for on this very floor, by allowing five slaves to be enumerated and counted, for the purpose of representation, as equal to three white persons.

In section nine, article one, I find the importation of African slaves to be prohibited after the year 1808, and that the Congress shall have the power to impose upon them up to that period of time. On this subject I shall have more to say hereafter.

But, stronger still, in the shape of a constitutional recognition of slavery, I find in section second, article four, the provision requiring the Congress to make laws "not inconsistent with" the claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due—"to the citizen or citizens of another State."

Mr. Chairman, I need not ask any one, here or elsewhere, who is not familiar with the course of events during the last twenty-five years, but more particularly with those of the last ten years, whether any one of these provisions of the Constitution has been complied with and carried out in good faith by the people of the North? On the contrary, they have been violated in every respect almost daily by the action of the States of the North, in their legislative bodies and in their conventions, and by the people, in their primary meetings, in their schools and colleges, in their pulpits, and by their nobles, until at last their violation of the rights of the South has resulted in the establishment by a body of bandits on the people of a sovereign State, and in the commission of the three highest crimes known to the laws of the land—the perpetration of murder, insurrection, and treason.

That this extraordinary attempt to subvert the institutions of the South and free the slaves of the Carolina this day in favor of reopening the African slave trade; and had I time, I would, at some length, discuss this question and relate its history. I have, however, before me the resolutions on this subject offered in the Legislature of South Carolina in 1857, when the subject was first mooted under the recommendation of his excellency Governor Adams; and those resolutions, sustaining the negative position, were, by consent of all parties, laid upon the table, where they sleep the sleep of death, and where they will never know a waking. True, a few individuals within the borders of my State have been concerned in a violation of the laws upon this subject. That, however, is not a reflection of the tone and sentiment of South Carolina, but more particularly of my own constituents; and I announce it here, that, out of fourteen thousand votes in my congressional district, I have never heard of but two men who are advocates of the measure.

I have but one other fact to refer to, to show the sentiment of South Carolina, and I will then dismiss this theme. In the early part of last November I was in the city of Charleston, when a meeting came off at Mr. Haddrell's Point, on the bay, across the bay and in sight of that city. Though it had been paraded in the newspapers of the State that the meeting was to take place, and that distinguished gentlemen had been invited to attend and participate in the proceedings, I had it from the lips of gentlemen who addressed the meeting that day, and who was one of the prime movers of the measure in the South Carolina Legislature, that at the meeting, within sight of a city of fifty or sixty thousand inhabitants, and only a few miles from the city of Charleston, and within twenty minutes sail, the party in favor of reopening the African slave trade could gather together at Haddrell's Point only one hundred and seventy-five men. There it also from the lips of those present, that a portion of that body was opposed to it, and would not support it, and that, in their power, the reopening of the African slave trade.

A gentleman from Illinois, whom I do not now see in his seat, [Mr. FLEMING], some weeks since, asked the members from South Carolina a question upon the subject of reopening the trade. The answers of two or three of my colleagues, he refused to yield the floor further, though I tendered two or three ineffectual efforts to get the floor to state these facts. Therefore, I give him my opinion now, and I repeat it, that not one thousand men in South Carolina would be found who would deposit their votes in favor of reopening the African slave trade. We regard it, in point of economy, as one of the greatest dangers that could possibly befall the institution of slavery. But I have not time to discuss this matter further.

I proceed and ask, gentlemen, if you render up your fugitive slaves when they escape from us? You dare not say you do. Have you kept in good faith a solitary compromise we have made with you? You have not. If we complain, you scoff. If I threaten consequences, you retort by threats of coercion.

And now, gentlemen, let me tell you once for all, you are rousing the quiet and conservative men of the South into a determined spirit of resistance. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COSGROVE] told this side of the House, some weeks ago, about the character of the men who prayed and fought, and I retort it upon him, and tell him that this is the class of men in my section most to be feared; that they are well wight that point; that, in the face of the constant agitation and assaults made upon them and their institutions, they are led to say, "Let us settle this question at once, and, if need be, draw the sword and throw away the scabbard." I repeat, sir, that I, for one, do not see to this struggle come. I know the people of the South are brave. I believe the people of the North to be equally so. The American citizen is alike brave, wherever you find him, amidst the eternal snows of the polar regions, along the more temperate zones, and within the circle of the tropics, amidst the evergreen of that life-giving climate. I am not of the school that believe that this Union will ever be dissolved, but by a class of arms preceding or immediately following it.

If the sentiment of sympathy we see daily expressed with the fate of John Brown, after his invasion of Virginia; if the sentiments contained in the Helper book; if the programme marked out by SEWARD and his satellites; if the numerous Republican and Abolition meetings, of which I see an account in the newspaper press, be a fair index of public opinion at the North, then I announce it here, as my deliberate opinion, that nineteen out of every twenty of my constituents are in favor of the reopening of the African slave trade; and if you continue to pursue this course of insult and aggression, I, though I claim to be a constitutional, union-loving man, will return to my constituents and sound the alarm, and with my own hands kindle the beacon-fire, and kindle the torch of civil war, and will then to the defense of their rights. My voice shall not be silent; but, like Rodrick Dhu, with "flaming dagger and blazing torch," my cry shall be, "to arms! to arms! to arms!"

It was the hope of the South, but a few short weeks ago, that Virginia would take the lead in some measure or measures that would adjust all the difficulties existing between the sections on this momentous and all-important subject. From present indications I see no prospect of her recommending or inaugurating any new policy; and, therefore, I am constrained to continue to consider once more to the people of the North the issue at the ballot-box. I, as one of the Representatives of the South, accept that issue, and my people will accept it. We are neither the custodian of Virginia's rights nor the guardian of her honor. Rights we have, but the Old Dominion taken care of both. True to her ancient position, she has meted out to the invaders of her soil the just reward and punishment due their crimes and conduct. The calm dignity of her position now remains the admiration of the South. My sympathies are and have been with her in all the trying scenes through which she has recently passed; and had the feeble support of this right arm been required in her behalf, it should have been rendered as readily as ever it was extended to her by my own constituents in the Senate. But Virginia needed it not. She has given one of the best practical illustrations of the sovereignty of the States and genuine State-rights doctrines that has yet been presented to the people of this Confederacy since the foundation of the Republic.

As I have already said, Virginia has once more tendered the issue, as I understand her, at the ballot-box on the election of a President of these United States, for the four years succeeding the 4th of March, 1861; and I, for one, accept it, and I will not flinch from it.

Planting ourselves under the standard of the great Democratic party of the South, we will make one more effort to bear into the presidential chair a fair exponent of the Constitution in the person of the man, whoever he may be, whom the delegates in convention from the South and from the true Democracy of the North shall present to us. I shall stand by Virginia and the great States of the South in support of the nominee they may offer me; and if we go down in the struggle, I will stand by the Democratic Union, and will support the exigencies of our situation and the necessities of our position may demand.

And now, sir, I have a word or two to say on the subject of a vote which I cast here some time since for the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McCLEARN] as Speaker of this House. My vote has been characterized by a journal in my own State as an "anti-slavery, Douglas, squatter sovereignty vote," and for which I have been set aside, by the ipso facto of said paper, "forever in the State of South Carolina." I will read one or two brief extracts from that paper.

"MR. ASHMOKE AND THE DEMOCRATIC BANNER.—When the vote was about to be taken on the election of Speaker in the House of Representatives, Mr. McCLEARN being the Democratic candidate, the accounts, as they were published yesterday in our columns, states as follows:

"MR. ASHMOKE, of South Carolina, made an earnest appeal to the Democrats from all sections to rally to the Democratic side. If they stricken down, that banner will cover them."

The Democratic banner on this occasion was borne by a free-soil squatter sovereignty internal improvement Democrat. (Of such a man can be called a Democrat at all.) Those were the principles which were in his mind. We know very little of Mr. ASHMOKE's political principles. He comes from the old Whig Federal district of the State—represented by Mr. THOMPSON, now a Congressman, and a Colonel out to Congress—running in favor of Gerry Taylor's election to the Presidency, against Mr. Perry. Regarding the Democratic candidate in favor of General Cass, we have always understood, however, that he was a State-rights, anti-tariff, anti-internal improvement, anti-free-soil man. In his canvass for the seat in Congress he occupies, he professes, he recovers, the strongest State rights and southern rights views. Now such a man, we would suppose, would not only refuse to rally under a banner inscribed with squatter sovereignty internal improvement by the Federal Government, but do all he could to strike it down. He seemed very jealous, at a short time since, of the House of Representatives, and its members were harshly assailed by a public press. The honor of the South and of South Carolina, we would suppose, might have been somewhat involved in elevating a man to the Speakership, flagrantly representing principles hostile to the South, and to the rights and interests of its people. Yes, for some time since, we have seen in a banner which has inscribed upon it: "Extension of the South (with squatter sovereignty internal improvement, no more slave States); and the plan of the Federal Treasury for internal improvements." He says that "if stricken down," it will "cover them." It was a fine thing, it was a fine thing, it will cover him, politically, as effectively as his feet of earth. Can't Mr. ASHMOKE be persuaded to come into the Charleston convention, and bring his Democratic banner with him? It may cover more people than himself."—Charleston Mercury, February 4.

Acknowledging no allegiance to, or affinity with, the sentiments that control that paper, I yet deem it due to those whom I represent to put myself right in regard to the matter. Having no disposition, Mr. Chairman, to enter into a long paper controversy whilst is the discharge of my public duties here, I shall, nevertheless, proceed to show the gross injustice that has been done, not only to me, but to my honorable and distinguished colleagues. I have no objection to allude to has also indulged in a sneer at the whole people of my congressional district. In answer to it, I have only to say that I am proud of the distinction they have conferred upon me, and that they are the equals, in every respect, of any constituency in my State or elsewhere. I am, sir, in saying that the people whom I have the honor to represent will not suffer by comparison, either on the score of intelligence, or patriotism, or in their fidelity to the Constitution fairly administered, with any other constituency throughout the length and breadth of this land. They are true and loyal sons of the South, of the institutions of the South, and of the Constitution of the country. They are the sole judges of the qualifications and conduct of their Representative, and to them an account of my stewardship shall be rendered, respectfully, at the next election.

It will be bold, fearless, and true. The assaults upon me and upon my vote for Mr. McCLEARN were gratuitous, uncalled-for, and unprovoked; and I shall now proceed to vindicate that vote, and to show, however profane as I have to say on that point, my recollection to the recollection of the House the fact that I distinctly disavowed and repudiated all squatter-sovereignty doctrines and sympathies when I cast that vote. The first gentleman who was nominated and voted for here, as the Democratic candidate for the Speakership, [Mr. BOCK], having withdrawn himself from the contest, and Mr. MILLON having been substituted in his place, I voted, with every Representative of the South, not only for those gentlemen, but I voted also with the Representatives of the North, for Mr. McCLEARN, the same State, who was an old-line Whig. I voted then for Mr. SCOTT, of California; for Mr. MAYNARD, of Tennessee, who was another old-line Whig; for Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, a former Know Nothing; but who, having repudiated that party, had become a Democrat; for Mr. BELL, of the Democracy of the Union; for Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, and for others. Throughout the contest I cast my vote in company with all the Democracy of the South. In voting for these gentlemen I did not commit myself, any of the doctrine of Whig or Know Nothingism. After the failure to elect Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, there was a caucus of Democrats called and held in this Hall the night before the gentleman from Illinois was placed in nomination. When Mr. McCLEARN was nominated, I voted for him, and was joined by his colleagues, [Mr. ROBINSON], who distinctly announced that Mr. McCLEARN would not suffer his name to come in conflict with that of any other Democrat on this floor. Mr. McCLEARN had never failed to vote with the great majority of the South, and I voted for him, the State-rights men of the South, in every ballot for every Democrat presented. A committee of three was appointed that night—there being no nomination—to confer with the friends of Mr. McCLEARN, and see whether he could not be elected; and he was proposed next day by Mr.

the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of War communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 1st of February, the information called for in that resolution, relative to the payments, agreements, arrangements, &c., in connection with the purchase and ventilation of the Caspio and Post Office extensions; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; and a motion of Mr. DAVIS to print the report was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, submitting additional estimates of appropriations for the Indian service in Oregon and Washington for the current and ensuing fiscal years; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GWIN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of appropriations for the following mail routes, &c., in the northern portion of that State: weekly mail from Cloverdale, Sonoma county, to Eureka, in Humboldt county; a daily mail from Eureka to Uniontown, Humboldt county; a weekly mail from Uniontown, Humboldt county, to Orleans Bar, Klamath county, via Hooper Valley; a weekly mail from Eureka to Matole Valley, via Bear River, Plumas county; a daily mail from Uniontown to Crescent City, via Trinidad and Gold Bluffs, Klamath county; a weekly mail from Crescent City to Happy Camp, Del Norte county, via Saylor's Diggs and Indian Creek; a weekly mail from Weaverville, Trinity county, via the forks of Salmon river, Klamath county, via Battle-sake, Grizzly Gulch, and Buellville, Klamath county; an appropriation for a fog-gun and light-house on Panna de los Reyes; an appropriation for a first-class light on Cape Mendocino, which is the most easterly point in the United States; an appropriation for a lighthouse at Crescent City, Del Norte county, and Trinidad, Klamath county; an appropriation to place buoys in Humboldt bay and bar, and for movable beacon ranges by which to cross the bar; in favor of creating a colliery, to be commenced by the State, in the forks of Salmon river, Klamath county, and an appropriation for the purpose of blowing up Blossom Rock, in the harbor of San Francisco; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, requesting its Representatives and instructing its Senators to use their influence to have all future contracts for the transmission of the ocean mails made with such parties, and over such routes, as will secure the greatest dispatch in the transmission of the mails to and from that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY presented the petition of Augustus Smith, praying payment of the amount due him for salary and expenses, while inspector of customs at Tampa Bay, Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of Joseph H. Walker, praying to be indemnified for services rendered in the transmission of mails, which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CAMERON presented six petitions of manufacturers, coal operators, merchants, farmers, mechanics, miners, and laborers, of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, praying such a modification of the tariff as will afford protection to the industrial and productive interests of the country, the abolition of, or a change in, the warehouse system, and the substitution of specific for ad valorem duties; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAUN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of a Sunday mail from San Francisco to Sacramento, on occasions when the mail shall be delayed at San Francisco for the former city, which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLINGMAN presented the petition of J. Heubert, praying to be allowed salary as United States consul at Lyons, in France, during the time he held that office, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. IVERSON presented the petition of the surviving children of Ann Jackson, praying for the arrears of pension due their mother; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of the surviving children of Elizabeth Rowan, praying for the arrears of pension due their mother; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, it was Ordered, That the memorial of W. C. Grizner, praying compensation for damages obtained by the non fulfillment of a contract made by the Commissioner of Patents with the inventor of the development of their machine, on the basis of patents, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Captain John B. Montgomerie, of the United States Navy, praying to be released from his liability for an unpaid balance of public money interest to him for recruiting purposes, and lost by the death of his son, which is on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of J. W. Dyer, A. L. Dyer, and W. W. Dyer, praying that an amount of tonnage duty exacted from the ship Corinthia may be refunded, submitted a report, directed by a bill (S. No. 32) for the relief of J. W. Dyer, A. L. Dyer, and W. W. Dyer. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the memorial of L. W. Rogers, praying an appropriation for his salary on a scale and judge of the first instance under the military government of California, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Horace E. Dimick, praying remuneration for improvements made by him in artillery, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYNE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of McFarland & Downey, praying that the amount due them for rent of their house in Los Angeles, California, occupied by the United States court, from the 27th of October, 1854, to the 5th of August, 1855, be collected, submitted a report, directed by a bill (S. No. 241) for the relief of McFarland & Downey. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a paper in favor of a law to extend the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States in the State of North Carolina, and to compensate the clerks, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of George G. Barnard, assignee of Hon. David C. Broderick, deceased, praying the enactment of a law authorizing the payment to him of the amount due said Broderick for salary in mileage at the time of his death, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 179) for the connection of a court-house in Appalachicola, in the State of Florida, reported it without amendment, and adversely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 54) to increase the salaries of the judges of the United States for the eastern and southern districts of Texas, and to regulate the compensation of the attorneys and marshals of the United States for said districts, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, believing this to be an inappropriate time for such action; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 173) concerning the courts of the United States in the State of Arkansas, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 153) relating to marriage in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and adversely.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 42) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Mark Elsha, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the papers relating to the claim of B. E. Edwards to land in New Mexico, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 240) to confirm the title of Benjamin E. Edwards to a certain tract of land in the Territory of New Mexico. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel V. Niles, praying compensation for services performed as a temporary clerk in the General Land Office, and the bill (S. No. 84) for the relief of Samuel V. Niles, reported the bill without amendment; and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMMOND, from the Committee on Naval Affairs and Marine, to whom was referred the memorial of Lieutenant T. A. M. Craven, praying additional compensation during the time he was in command of the expedition to make an exploration and verification of the surveys made for a ship canal near the Isthmus of Darien, to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific, by the Attrato and Trunado rivers, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 244) for the relief of T. A. M. Craven. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 243) to amend the act to provide for executing the public printing, and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes, approved August 26, 1852; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 238) for the relief of M. C. Grizner; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

CHARLES PEARSON.

Mr. HALE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 239) for the relief of the legal representative of Charles Pearson, deceased; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HALE. If the Senate will give me their attention for two minutes, I shall ask them to put this bill on its passage; and I think they will do it. It is a bill to refund $140 to the legal representative of an insane man, who died in the insane asylum at Concord, in March, last year. In his insanity he paid what money he had to the treasurer at Boston, under the idea that he had great inventions that he was making. The Commissioner of Patents became satisfied that he was insane, and was willing to refund the money, but had no power to do so. A petition was sent to Congress, which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, last year, and they unanimously reported in favor of refunding the money; and the bill passed the Senate unanimously. The estate is poor, and the settlement of it is delayed simply by the refusal to pass this bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which directed the respondent, to a legal representative of Charles Pearson, late of Concord, New Hampshire, deceased, of $140, being the amount of money paid into the United States Patent Office by him whilst he was laboring under a state of insanity.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS BROWN.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Brown, of Florida, to report a bill for his relief. It is to pay him for his services as clerk of the Florida Legislature of Florida. The old gentleman is about eighty years of age. The bill is to pay him for work done about fifteen years ago. He is now lame and in bad health. I beg the Senate to take it up and pass it.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 242) for the relief of Thomas Brown, of Florida, was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid to Thomas Brown, of Florida, $257, being the balance due him for services as secretary and clerk of the Senate of the Legislature of the Territory of Florida, as allowed by that Legislature in 1845.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. IVERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, in reference to the Private Calendar, to move the Senate that we proceed first to the consideration of the bills which have been reported by the Court of Claims, and consider those to which there shall be no objection, and then go back and go on regularly.

Mr. GWIN. I hope you will trust we shall take up the Calendar regularly. It is private bill day, and let us give all a chance.

Mr. IVERSON. I have been instructed by the committee to make this motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia, on behalf of the Committee on Claims, moves that the Senate first take up the cases which have been reported from the Court of Claims.

Mr. IVERSON. I will state the reason which operated on the committee in making this motion. The act which established the Court of Claims directs that:

"said court shall prepare a bill or bills in those cases which shall have received the favorable decision thereof, in such form as, if enacted, will carry the same into effect."

And then:

"Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That said reports, and the bills reported as aforesaid, shall, if not finally acted upon during the session of Congress, which said reports are made, be continued from session to session, and from Congress to Congress, until the same shall be finally acted upon; and the consideration of said bills, when introduced at the subsequent session of Congress, be resumed, and the said reports and bills be proceeded with in the same manner as though finally acted upon at the session of Congress last past."

It will be perceived, then, that when the Court of Claims makes a report in favor of a claimant, and submits a bill, under the provisions of this act it goes on the Calendar at that session, and is to remain upon the Calendar from session to session, and from Congress to Congress, until it shall be finally disposed of. Many of the bills which are on the Calendar to-day were reported by the Court of Claims three or four sessions ago; and they lost their priority by the action of the two Houses, when, in truth and in fact, they ought to have been considered at the last session and the session before. In justice to them, under the act of Congress, they ought to have been considered long ago; and, if the act be pursued, they will be considered and acted upon by the Senate long before any other case which has been reported at this session, and is now on the Calendar. It is a matter of justice, and strict justice, that they should have priority. Therefore, I ask that that may be the order pursued.

Mr. YULEE. I hope that order will not be adopted. If the bills reported from the Court of Claims have lost their place, and have remained upon the Calendar during one or two sessions, I must charge it to the fault of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. IVERSON. The Committee on Claims have no more control over it than any other committee.

Mr. YULEE. I am going to show how it is so. I charge it to the fault of the Committee on Claims, because it is upon the motion of the Committee on Claims that the Senate has been induced from session to session to adopt what seemed to me to be the erroneous and unjust policy of acting only upon those private bills which were not objected to; thus placing it in the power of an individual member to postpone upon the Calendar, and to postpone eternally, any bill to which there might be only a single objection. If the Committee on Claims will adopt the proper course of taking up upon the Calendar the bills as they stand and disposing of them at the time, whether they be objected to or not, there is no danger that any bill reported by the Court of Claims will lose its place, or will fail of attention in the Senate at the appropriate session.

But, sir, the very action which has been read by the chairman of the Committee on Claims presents to the Senate a very obvious reason why his motion should not be adopted. Bills reported from the Court of Claims have the advantage of being taken up at the first opportunity, and with no delay or postponement. They lose no place and no advantage. They require no repetition of action by the committee. It is not so with bills which have not had that advantage, and which do not come before this body with the prestige of a report from the Court of Claims in favor of the claimant.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator allow me a moment? In order to obviate any further discussion, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. YULEE. I am satisfied.

JOHN SCOTT AND OTHERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first bill on the Private Calendar is the bill (S. No. 22) for the relief of John Scott, Hill W. House, and Samuel O. House.

It was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to release John Scott, principal, and Hill W. House and Samuel O. House, sureties, from a judgment recovered against them by the United States, on the 4th day of April, 1855, in the district court for the Eastern district of Florida, on a contract awarded to John Scott for carrying the mail upon the route No. 3503, from New Orleans to Key West, from January 15, 1853, to June 30, 1855.

Mr. YULEE. I will state that that bill has been passed by the Senate, in the same words, at four different sessions, I think, but has failed of action in the House of Representatives on account of its reaching there too late.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SURETIES OF W. G. KENDALL.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 23) for the relief of Arnold Harris and Samuel F. Butterworth, sureties of William G. Kendall, late deputy postmaster at New Orleans, Louisiana, from all claim which the United States may have against them or either of them, on account; and it also directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause any judgment which may have been rendered against Arnold Harris and Samuel F. Butterworth, or either of them, as sureties of Kendall, to be canceled, and satisfied of record.

Mr. YULEE. The same bill was passed last year in the Senate after discussion; passed, I believe, nearly unanimously.

Mr. IVERSON. Is there a report in the case?

Mr. YULEE. Yes, sir. The same bill was passed at the last session.

Mr. IVERSON. I do not know anything about that; I want to hear the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the following report:

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of Arnold Harris and Samuel F. Butterworth, respectfully report:

That the petitioners seek relief from a penalty they have incurred as sureties of William G. Kendall, a deputy postmaster at New Orleans. The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of Arnold Harris and Samuel F. Butterworth respectfully sheweth:

That on the 14th of April, A. D. 1855, they signed the official bond of William G. Kendall, late postmaster of New Orleans, as his sureties in the penal sum of $60,000. On the 7th May, 1855, Kendall was dismissed from the office of postmaster at New Orleans, and was charged with having received the mails; was indicted, tried, and acquitted. After his arrest, and before his trial, his account was audited by the Post Office Department, and a balance against him, as postmaster at New Orleans, of $10,832.19. This account was presented to Kendall; he failed to pay it. Early in June, 1855, the United States marshals were called upon by the Post Office Department to pay up the sum of $10,832.19, as sureties for Kendall; on the 7th day of June, 1855, your memorialists, S. F. Butterworth and William G. Kendall, late deputy postmaster at New Orleans, the sum of $5,000 on the credit of this account; on the 10th day of June, 1855, he deposited, in like manner, the further sum of $1,500. And on the 31st January, 1856, your memorialist, Arnold Harris, deposited with the Auditor of the Post Office Department at Washington, the sum of $1,680.15, being the balance claimed by and account to due from Kendall, as postmaster at New Orleans, to the United States Government, and was paid by him, as surety at New Orleans, and acquitted. He immediately left the United States and went to Mexico, where he now resides. After he had left the United States, your memorialist, Samuel F. Butterworth, received a letter from the Auditor of the Post Office Department, informing him that the account against him, for making out the account against Kendall an error had been made, and that there was still due the Department, from him, the sum of $10,832.19.

When the account was first stated by the Department, showing a balance against Kendall of $10,832.19, he (Kendall) was called on to settle with the Government, and that the claim was made merely to prevent him as a defaulter, and thus prejudice his case before the jury. Your memorialists, not doubting the statement, and certain of his innocence, paid the claim without investigation as soon as it was presented to them, and they did this to insure Kendall a fair trial, and because they knew that all of his available means were required by him to prepare for his defense; but your memorialists distinctly state that if the Department had at first claimed a balance of $10,358.04 due from Kendall, they certainly would not have paid that large sum without investigation and legal research, unless first indemnified by Kendall or his relatives.

By direction of the Government, suit was instituted against your memorialists, for the purpose of placing them (in Missouri) and your memorialists in the United States circuit court of Missouri, in reversion this last claimed balance of $10,358.04; process was served at the late residence of Kendall; your memorialists appeared by attorney, and suffered judgment to be obtained against them by default. The Government then moved for judgment by the United States circuit court for the "grave error" of $10,358.04 the first account against Kendall for a sum of $2,765.47 less than the sum actually due, and your memorialists, who the clerk who made out the account was intemperate.

Your memorialists ask the Congress of the United States to release them from the said judgment, and to order judgment against them as above stated, and they assign as a sufficient reason for such request the fact that, by the action of an intemperate clerk in the Post Office Department (since dismissed), they have been deprived of all remedy against Kendall, who had departed from the country before the last claim was made known to either of your memorialists.

A further fact your memorialists present: Kendall, charged with a high crime, was vigorously prosecuted; extraordinary means were used to procure his conviction in the United States district court, at New Orleans, was sentenced to imprisonment for life, and a writ of habeas corpus was employed, which heated that he was to receive a free pardon from the Government in the event of his conviction. To meet this unjust persecution and monstrous proceeding, on the part of the United States, Kendall was constrained to employ a great sum of money to retain the services of Senator Bates and other eminent lawyers; to procure the attendance of important witnesses; and to conduct his defense in such manner as to secure the acquittal of his honor and his liberty were involved in the contest, and a particle of proof of guilt was produced, and he was acquitted.

The money thus expended by Kendall, but for the action of the Government, would have constituted a means of paying and relieving the said sureties from the consequences of the oppressive action of the Government he was deprived of three means. Under these circumstances, your memorialists submit that his suffering ought not to be added to make good the money thus expended.

The above facts considered, your memorialists ask such relief as the Congress of the United States may deem just and proper.

S. F. BUTTERWORTH.
ARNOLD HARRIS.

Mr. IVERSON. (before the reading of the report was concluded.) The Clerk is being impudently toward me. I withdraw the call for the reading.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHARD W. MEADE.

The bill (S. No. 56) for the relief of Richard W. Meade was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was a petition to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to Richard W. Meade, late a lieutenant in the United States Navy, the sum of $566.90, being the amount of expenses incurred by him and his clerk for subsistence, while under orders of the Navy Department, and detained at New Orleans, from July 15 to September 30, 1849, less the amount already received by them for commutation of their rations during the same period.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID D. PORTER.

The bill (S. No. 57) for the relief of David D. Porter was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was a petition to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to David D. Porter, a lieutenant in the Navy of the United States, the sum of $743, for certain extraordinary expenses incurred by him mentaries, reported a comprehensive and clear, and a just and politic system, under which we have administered the rights of parties for about a quarter of a century. If it were proper upon a subject of this kind, I would go into a vindication of the policy of that law; but, for the reasons I have just stated, that is unnecessary. This case comes clearly within its provisions.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE STERLEY.

The bill (S. No. 70) for the relief of George Sterley was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to refer to the Third Auditor of the Treasury the account furnished by George Sterley, for services rendered and expenses incurred by him as agent, appointed by the Indian commissioners of the United States for the State of California, to visit the northern tribes of Indians in that State, with authority to the Auditor to cause it to be settled upon principles of equity and justice, and to pay the amount. The settlement is to be made upon certified vouchers, showing that the expenses were actually incurred, and that the services paid were just and proper under the peculiar circumstances of the case.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD N. KENT.

The bill (S. No. 74) for the relief of Edward N. Kent was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. Its purpose is to require the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Edward N. Kent, of New York, $20,000, in full compensation for the perpetual use, in all the present and future minting establishments of the United States, of the apparatus for testing the gold and other precious metals from foreign substances, of which he is the inventor and patentee; but he is first to secure to the United States the perpetual use of the apparatus, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHARD CHENEY.

The bill (S. No. 77) for the relief of Richard Cheney was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Commissioner of Customs to settle the account of Richard Cheney, assignee of Horace F. Russ, for the construction by the latter of the granite pavement on Battery street, in front of the United States custom-house, at San Francisco, and to pay him such sum as may be shown to be legally and equitably due, with interest at six per cent. per annum, from the completion of the work, with a proviso that the sum shall not exceed $3,500.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIMON DE VISSER AND JOSE VILLARUBIA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 39) for the relief of Simon De Visser and Jose Villarubia, of New Orleans. It provides for restoring Simon De Visser and Jose Villarubia, jr., merchants of New Orleans, from the payment of all claims, penalties, and forfeitures which may legally exist against them, in favor of the United States, arising out of frauds committed in the custom-house of New Orleans by one Charles Meteye, the latter having been judicially declared to be entirely innocent of those frauds; and especially from the penalties and forfeitures claimed by reason of those frauds, in two suits now pending in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana, in which the United States are plaintiffs and De Visser and Villarubia are defendants. The defendants, however, are to pay all costs incurred in those suits, and the rights of the United States against Charles Meteye are expressly reserved.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the report in that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk informs the Chair that there is a printed statement of the case, consisting of the petition and accompanying documents, but no report. Does the Senator call for the reading of that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know something about the case.

Mr. CLAY. I will state to the Senator that the proof was so clear that these men were entirely innocent of any fraud or intention of fraud on the Government, that the prosecuting attorney at the time of the trial acquitted them before the court of any sort of course whatever. It appears that it was the fault rather of the custom-house officers than of the agent or clerk of those parties that these frauds were committed. There was, to my mind, a clear delinquency of duty or carelessness on their part that enabled this clerk to commit these frauds. They did not incur to the benefit of the house, for they really paid the duties, but this clerk took advantage of them, and appropriated the money which he affected to pay as duties. The officers of customs were, or at least one of them was, advised of the fact that these frauds had been committed and failed to have the man arrested, suffered him to get off, and therefore involved these innocent persons in the payment of the duties and in being subjected to the penalties which were attached to the fraud. That is about the substance of it. The committee were unanimous. The bill passed the Senate at the last session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have nothing to say about it, after that statement.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCIS HUTTMAN.

The bill (S. No. 78) for the relief of Francis Huttman was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the claim of Francis Huttman, for return of tonnage and light duties illegally exacted and paid by him on Peruvian, Danish, and German vessels at San Francisco, California, and to pay him the amount due, with interest, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, from the date of the exaction of those duties.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TENCH TILGHMAN.

The bill (S. No. 79) for the relief of Tench Tilghman was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Tench Tilghman $1,000, for losses sustained by him in consequence of his appointment to a consulate, which was abolished by the Spanish Government while he was on his way to take charge of it.

Mr. GRIMES. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce when Mr. Tilghman was subjected to this very great disappointment.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator that he was appointed by General Taylor to a consulate; I do not remember the place—some small place, though, in the West India islands—perhaps it was on one of the islands; and he started to perform the duties of the office and got as far as Savannah, when he there learned the fact that the office had been abolished, and he came back. In the meantime he had incurred a good deal of expense in the removal of his family there on the route, and in bringing them back; and in addition to that, he claims that he sunk a good deal of money by the neglect of his business and by preparing himself for this mission. The committee, however, only propose to pay him the expenses that were incurred in the way of travel—his actual traveling expenses.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN A. FROST.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 7) for the relief of the legal representatives of John A. Frost, deceased, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It declares that the committee of the first session of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the forward officers of the late exploring expedition," approved February 1, 1849, shall be construed to embrace the claim of John A. Frost, who was acting boatswain of the United States brig Porpoise in that expedition, from January 1, 1839, to July 7, 1842.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. HUGHMAN, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed a bill (S. No. 146) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue registers to the owners of the schooners Helen Blood and Sarah Bond, of Oswego, New York.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. HAYES, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had ordered the printing of a letter from the Secretary of State, communicating certain correspondence relative to the claim of Messrs. Rogers and Son, of Newfoundland, on March 1, 1860, at one o'clock, p. m.

Also, that the House had ordered this day the printing of the following documents:

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating a statement of miscellaneous claims paid at the Treasury for the year ending June 30, 1859—ordered at twelve o'clock and seventeen minutes.

Letter of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating reports of the board of naval officers ordered to examine into the condition of the navy-yards—ordered at twelve o'clock and eighteen minutes; and

Letter of the Secretary of War, communicating a transcript of the official Army Register for the year ending June 30, 1859—ordered at twelve o'clock and twenty minutes.

WILLIAM D. MOSELEY.

The bill (S. No. 89) for the relief of William D. Moseley was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. Its purpose is to release William D. Moseley from the penalties and liabilities incurred by him as surty of Harrison R. Blanchard, on his contract with the United States, dated September 25, 1855, for the supply of live-oak timber.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want the attention of the chairman of the committee that reported this bill, for a single moment. If I understand the case, it is this: Mr. Blanchard made a contract to deliver a certain quantity of oak timber at the navy-yard.

Mr. MALLORY. There is a printed report in the case.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir; and I have read it. Mr. Blanchard contracted to deliver a certain quantity of live oak at a specified sum. He, or his assignee, Mr. Moseley, delivered a portion of it at the rate stipulated. He alleges that he was prevented from delivering the rest by an intimation that there were Indian hostilities. The balance was supplied by the next bidder above him, and the difference between the bid next above him and his own, amounted to some two or three thousand dollars. He therefore suffered a loss between that sum and the sum which he would have received if he had himself furnished the timber.

Now, if I can understand the matter, there is no allegation here that Mr. Moseley ever lost one farthing. He delivered the greater quantity of this oak timber at $175 a cubic foot. I think, before he is entitled to relief here, he should show us that he actually sustained a loss in the whole transaction. When he does that, I shall be willing that he should be relieved of the two parts of the timber at $175; the other man came in, and delivered the balance at $2, and now he claims to be relieved from that difference. I would relieve him if he showed me that in the whole thing taken together, he sustained a loss. How do I know that he did not make $10,000 or two parts of the contract which he performed himself? If I could be satisfied as to that, I shall be satisfied to relieve him.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator from Maine speaks from a fresh reading of the report. The instructions of the first session of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the forward officers of the late exploring expedition," approved February 1, 1849, shall be construed to embrace the place the name of Mrs. Anne M. Smith, widow of the late Brigadier General Penifer F. Smith, on the pension roll, at the rate of fifty dollars per month from the 6th of May, 1858, for and during her natural life.

Mr. IVERSON. This is one of those pension cases that I have always been opposed to, and I must say my position is not a novel one. It proposes to allow fifty dollars a month—much more than half the pay of a lieutenant colonel, which has usually been the maximum of pensions. I observe that the Committee on Pensions have reported this bill in favor of Mrs. Smith, the widow of General Penifer F. Smith, and they have reported against the application of Mrs. Macomb, the widow of General Macomb. I move to amend the bill by adding Mrs. Macomb for the same pay; giving notice, however, that I shall vote against the bill if it is amended, because I am opposed to it on principle. I think that Mrs. Macomb's case is quite as meritorious as that of Mrs. Smith.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the amendment will not be adopted, if the gentleman gives notice that he is going to vote against the bill.

Mr. IVERSON. I want to be just, and to have both put on an equality. I want Mrs. Macomb to be treated with the same liberality and generosity as Mrs. Smith.

Mr. CAMERON. Well, I shall not object to the amendment. Perhaps it will save time to let it go without opposition.

Mr. GRIMES. The chairman of the Committee on Pensions is not present, and there seems to be no one disposed to explain the difference which occurred to the Committee on Pensions on a point between these two cases. The evidence before the Committee on Pensions showed very conclusively that the disease of which General Penifer F. Smith died was contracted while in service in the Mexican war. Such were not the facts, as appeared by evidence, in regard to General Macomb. General Macomb, I recollect the number of years ago, was stationed for thirteen years, immediately prior to his decease, in this city as General-in-Chief of the Army. He was a favorite officer. He drew the largest salary the Government paid any retired general in the service; and died of a natural disease. General Penifer F. Smith, on the contrary, entered the Army at the commencement of the Mexican war, and commanded a division of the Army during the entire campaign; was one of the most distinguished officers of the Army; died of a disease contracted while in the service; and was actually on his way to command the army in Utah at the time of his death. That is the difference between the two cases.

The Committee on Pensions were not disposed to establish the rule that a pension should be granted to the widow of an officer who died of natural decay, or of a natural disease; but saw fit to adhere to the principle that has heretofore been established by Congress, that no pension should be granted to the widow of an officer who died of a disease contracted while in the line of the service, or of wounds received in actual conflict in defense of the country. I will say, however, that the committee came to the conclusion that they would report a general bill, and I do not know that the voters of any other State but this that officer died of disease contracted in the line of the service, or of wounds received in actual conflict in defense of the country. I will say, however, that the committee came to the conclusion that they would report a general bill, and I do not know that the voters of any other State but this that officer died of disease contracted in the line of the service, or of wounds received in actual conflict in defense of the country. I will say, however, that the committee came to the conclusion that they would report a general bill, and I do not know that the voters of any other State but this that officer died of disease contracted in the line of the service, or of wounds received in actual conflict in defense of the country.

Mr. MALLORY. I will ask the Senator, before he sits down, whether there was any evidence before the committee at all tending to show that General Macomb did not die from disease contracted in the service?

Mr. GRIMES. There was evidence that General Smith died of disease contracted while in the service; but no evidence that General Macomb was not.

Mr. MALLORY. Was there any evidence on that subject at all with regard to General Macomb?

Mr. GRIMES. I think none on the subject, but I am not certain about it. Certainly, there was no evidence which showed that he died of disease contracted in the line of the service.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment. I received this morning a petition from Mrs. Arabella Riley, the widow of General Riley, who died some two or three years ago in the service, which I ought to have presented. His history, I suppose, is known to every member of the Senate. We all know him, and we all know his services. He was a body in the country knows that; and I move to amend the amendment by adding the name of Mrs. Riley, widow of General Riley, who died of disease contracted in the Mexican war.

Mr. GRIMES. General Riley died of cancer, if I recollect aright.

Mr. SEWARD. He died of a disease of the bowels, attended with cancer, which consumed and wasted him away.

Mr. IVERSON. So far as regards the discrimination between the two cases, I do not think it has much merit. General Smith was in the Army, and he died in his bed. He died from natural causes. He did not die from any wounds received in battle. If he had died from disease contracted in the line of the service, there would be no necessity for his coming to Congress for a pension.

General Smith would only have to apply to the Pension Office, and under the general law, she would receive a pension. But I apprehend it is not one of those cases in which, under the law, the widow is entitled to a pension.

General Smith is not a case in which the officer died from disease contracted in the service; but from such a disease as he would have contracted, probably, if he had never been in the service.

General Macomb died here, it is true, while in the service of the United States. He was stationed where the law made it necessary for him to live. He could not go out into active service, because the law made this the headquarters of the Major General-in-Chief of the Army, and he lived here under the requirements of the law. He was one of the most gallant men that ever belonged to our Army; and he has reflected as much honor, credit, and glory on the American arms, probably, as any man who has ever fought for us. He was commander at Plattsburg—one of the most important battles of the war with Great Britain; and he was selected, after the war, to be general-in-chief, in preference to General Scott and other generals, I believe, by Mr. Adams, who was then President of the United States. He died, and left his widow poor. I understand she is wholly destitute of means, and she is very old. She needs the bounty of this Government, she needs it as much as Mrs. Smith, and I declare, considering her circumstances, that she needs it more. It is said she keeps house here. I know a woman may be very poor, and yet a good housekeeper, and all that. I do not speak from personal knowledge of Mrs. Macomb, because my acquaintance with her is very limited; but I understand from good authority that she is in embarrassed circumstances. What may be the case of Mrs. Smith, I know nothing about; but this is more applicable to the bounty and generosity of the Government in both cases, and I think one stands on as high a footing as the other. The case of Mrs. Riley I know nothing about. I am willing to vote to put that on also, though I have no objection to the bill in any and every shape in which it can be presented.

There seems to me to be a very great injustice and favoritism, if I may so express myself, in giving these bounties to the widows of officers, and excluding them entirely from the widows of soldiers. You never give the widow of a soldier a pension, unless she brings herself within the provisions of the law. You never give pensions, as a mere act of bounty, where the soldier dies in the ordinary discharge of his duties, and from disease contracted while he is in the discharge of those duties. You never give the widow of a soldier a pension, unless she brings herself within the provisions of the law. You never give pensions, as a mere act of bounty, where the soldier dies in the ordinary discharge of his duties, and from disease contracted while he is in the discharge of those duties.

Here is a case that is taken out of the ordinary rule. Therefore, these pensions have been allowed at the rate of the half pay of a lieutenant colonel, and nothing beyond that, and that is only thirty dollars a month; but you propose to give Mrs. Smith fifty dollars a month. On what principle is that predicated? I know there are one or two exceptions to the general rule. You made an exception at the last Congress, in favor of Mrs. Gaines. There was no reason on the face of the earth why her case should have been taken out of the ordinary rule. The rule heretofore has been, in all cases—until, I believe, Mrs. Gaines's case at the last Congress, to give to the widow the half pay of a lieutenant colonel, and nothing beyond that. You went beyond that in Mrs. Gaines's case, and you are now opening the door again, and pursuing the same bad precedent, to give Mrs. Smith fifty dollars a month; and then the next widow will come, and the next, and the next, and on, and on. So you are breaking down the rule which Congress has established in all such cases heretofore. I shall move to reduce the amount from fifty to thirty dollars a month, so as to conform to the rule heretofore established, when the proper time comes. I have no objection now to putting on Mrs. Riley's case. It is quite as good as Mrs. Smith's or Mrs. Macomb's. I have no doubt of that, though it has not met the recommendation of the committee; but it is not in order, I suppose, until the amendment I have offered is adopted.

Mr. SEWARD. I move it as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. IVERSON. Then I have no objection to it.

Mr. SEWARD. I beg to ask the Senator from Mississippi if he will be so kind as to appoint with General Riley and his wife, how far I am correct in what I stated in regard to him?

Mr. DAVIS. Entirely correct. It only fell short of what was due to that gallant officer. General Riley served the service about the period of the increase of the Army under Mr. Jefferson, and was a subaltern in Forsyth's regiment on the Canadian frontier, distinguished at an early period for his gallantry, and marked by the most haughty defiance of death whenever he was seen in battle; and so it continued to extreme age. It was said of him at the battle of Chancellorsville, that he walked between his own line and that of the enemy under the cross-fire of both. I knew him well; I served under his command. A braver man, a kinder-hearted man, or a truer-hearted man, never lived. After the close of the war, he was appointed, in which he figured conspicuously on both of the great lines of operation, he went to California; and there civil duties devolved upon him, vexations to which he had been unaccustomed. He returned broken in health; and if his death was not the result of his military career, it was the result of his civil duties. He was not allowed to recover from the fatigues and exposure of that, before he was submitted to new and still more embarrassing trials to him.

I think, Mr. President, these are all meritorious cases. I concur with the Senator from Georgia in all he said in favor of General Macomb, and no one has yet detracted anything from General Smith. He is worthy of the praise which the Senator from Iowa has bestowed upon him. They are three highly meritorious cases. The widows are left in a state of destitution, and I think struck with astonishment at the argument of the Senator from Georgia, claiming that an invidious distinction was made in treating the widow of the officer differently from that of the enlisted man.

The widow of the enlisted man suffers usually little by his death. He would be an extraordinary case if he were to be gone for years in weeds as the widows of these gallant men still are. There is no parallelism in the cases. There is no just application in the argument. It is not merely that one is commissioned and the other is enlisted, but it is that the wife of one is left destitute by his death, and the other scarcely affected.

The Senator from Georgia is mistaken, too, in the argument he makes as to the amount which may be allowed—quite mistaken. The pay of a lieutenant colonel of engineers, topographical engineers, or dragoons, or of the cavalry, or of the mounted dragoons, cavalry, rifleman, or light infantry, is ninety-five dollars a month.

Mr. CLAY. What is that?

Mr. DAVIS. The last act; the present pay of the Army.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator knows the former pay of the lieutenant colonel was sixty dollars a month. The Senator from Georgia was right about that, and I feel bound to sustain him. These pensions were all, until within the last Congress or two, regulated by the former pay law, and the highest pension allowed to the widow of any officer or to any invalid soldier was the half pay of a lieutenant colonel of infantry, according to the previous law. That half pay was thirty dollars a month, according to my recollection. I am very positive the highest pension was thirty dollars; and, under the law, without a special enactment, General Scott had received it. I am coming to that; and I am, in there anything more absurd than to say that you will go back to the old pay in fixing the pension of the widow, though circumstances have shown you that the pay of the officers should be increased? What reason is there in it? If the cost of living has increased, or in other words the value of money has declined, and you have found it necessary to increase the amount to be paid per month, why should you adhere to the old measure in giving pensions? The two things follow together. They are coming to each other. It is a rule of a forum error.

Mr. IVERSON. Fifty dollars is more than half the pay of a lieutenant colonel.

Mr. DAVIS. A lieutenant colonel gets ninety-five dollars.

Mr. IVERSON. Or infantry?

Mr. DAVIS. No; in the cavalry, and in the mounted riflemen. It so happens that General Smith had command of mounted riflemen, and was entitled to the pay of a mounted rifleman until promoted to the grade of brigadier general. I have had occasion at a former time, and I will not weary the Senate, particularly as there are so many empty benches, by going over the argument now, further than to say it is due to ourselves, and it is due to justice that we should either give the Army officers additional pay, or, as a compensation, provide for their families in the event of their death; or, if we keep them down to a pay so low that they can barely subsist on it, we should provide for their families in the event of their death. It is a question of policy—an economical question. When you raise the pay of an officer, you must provide for his family in the event of his death; or will you provide for the exceptional cases that come before you in this form, widows asking relief, after the death of their husbands? I have always been willing—my friend from Alabama and myself differ in opinion—to make the law general, to extend it to every one so circumstanced; but I do feel that the three cases which are now presented, are cases of extraordinary merit. Those who differ from me as to the propriety of the general rule, may still concur with me as to the propriety of allowing it in these three cases.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am not a military man; nor do I suppose that what little I might personally say could help any one of these parties to aid even here; but I cannot permit the case of General Macomb's widow to pass without saying a word in accordance with my own State. General Macomb and the command at Plattsburg when our frontier was invaded by a powerful enemy, when the people of the State of Vermont were in great peril, and we went to his assistance—I say we, because I was among the individuals who went to him and served with him on that occasion. He did a great service, not only to the nation, but particularly and peculiarly to the State to which I belong. That State has had an opportunity to express its gratitude for his services on that occasion. The State manifested its gratitude to him, not merely by empty resolutions, but by giving him the title to a very valuable farm in sight of the battle-ground on which he encountered the enemy. They bear grateful recollections still of his memory, and his family, and I think it my privilege on this occasion to add my tribute to the desire which is expressed that his widow may not be neglected in our ministrations. She is, I believe, now in need; and at least her case is a strong one to my mind; very much stronger than the case of Mrs. Gaines, who was allowed the same amount last year. Her husband did not die of wounds contracted in the service. Both those men served out their lives in the service of their country to their days' end. Their widows were left in necessity. I am not personally acquainted with the condition of the widow of General Macomb; she resides in this city; but I am informed, and from the best information I have, I believe, she is needing aid. I have had this statement, placed in my hands a letter from her to the Senator from Mississippi, in which she says:

"I tell you, it will not be more than I paid for my late husband's wife."

She was the wife, I believe, of the latter part of the life of General Macomb; and, as she says, the amount she has paid of her husband's debts out of her own means would be as much as would be granted to her by this bill, if her name be inserted in it, as I think it should be. I hope there will be some further distinct notice taken of the case of Mrs. Gaines at the last Congress, and that of Mrs. Macomb at this session.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I know somewhat of the widow of General Macomb, and am very glad to see a movement made here to make her claim an amendment to this bill. As to the question whether she stands in need of this pension or not, I am not able to say, nor would it govern my vote. I would not inquire into that at all, though I believe she stands in need of it. I apprehend that she is giving a pension to all those who are like soldiers, are engaged, in the execution of their duty, to face death almost daily, is to remove from their minds—and thus make them more serviceable to the country—than anxiety which every honest man must feel for the fate of those who are dependent upon him. It is one of the moral power of the country thus to relieve the soldier's mind of all anxiety in an hour of fear for those who come behind him. But the policy of the law seems to be that he shall die either of wounds received in battle, or by disease contracted in the service. He may have passed through an entire military career at the head of his corps; he may have been the Bayard of the Army, without fear and without reproach, treading every path of duty fearlessly and honorably; he may be struck through a long and arduous career at the very head of his corps; and yet, if he should be struck down by disease, calamity, pestilence, famine, accident, his widow would receive nothing whatever. Her husband die of a disease received in the Army, or of wounds. It is a case that would tempt me to say, "What right have their widows to impose upon the committees of Congress their diseases as contracted in the Army; and thus we hear, session after session, assertions that certain individuals have died of diseases contracted in the service, when it is well known—and I am sure any one who has been in the service knows, and yet not brought down to a mathematical demonstration—that they die of those calamities and diseases by which men are ordinarily carried off."

Nor was the case put here by my friend from Georgia, the leading case on this point. We passed, some years ago, a pension for Mrs. Worth, the wife of a very distinguished officer, who did not die of a disease contracted in the service, or of wounds received in the Army, and we gave her half pay for the remainder of her life, and yet, for six months. If there be no general law (and I know there is none) under which this case can come, I am in favor, in cases of this kind, where the whole country is satisfied of the deserving merits of the parties whose widows come here, of making provision for them. Fortunately for me, nothing need be said of the career of General Macomb. His whole career is part of the military history of the country, and his services, reaching far through the light of time, confer more moral power on this Government than do a thousand common officers; and this Government cannot afford very cheaply, indeed, with a small pitance to the widow for such an officer. If we could possibly be guaranteed the possession of such officers as General Macomb, I should never rise here to question the wisdom of Congress in maintaining their widows throughout their natural life.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, if it is at all necessary, in regard to the case of Mrs. Macomb, that it should be known that she is in need of this pension, I beg leave to state that she is now or two has been a resident of the city of New Orleans, and I know, more painfully than I would desire to express, that there is a necessity on her part for this provision.

Mr. GRIMES. I regret exceedingly that the chairman of the committee is not here to defend it—

Mr. SEWARD. He would not defend it if he was here. Let us pass.

Mr. GRIMES. Or some other gentleman who is on that committee, for I understood that these reports were nearly unanimous—one in favor of Mrs. Smith, and one against Mrs. Macomb. I am not the special advocate of the reports in either case; but I am sure that the neighbors who have established in prior Congresses that pensions should be granted only to the widows of those who had died from wounds contracted in actual service or through disease contracted in actual service; and in undertaking to set on this general principle, as an organ of the Committee on Pensions, I understand a report adverse to the bill in relation to Mrs. Macomb. If the Senate see fit to change the general rule, I shall acquiesce in the decision, and if that is to be the decision I wish to submit another amendment. Residing in the neighborhood in which I do, is the widow of two officers of the Army.

Mr. MALLORY. Is that in order?

Mr. GRIMES. I have not submitted any amendment yet; but I wish to state what I intend to do. I am one of the neighbors who live in the widow of two officers of the Army. Those officers were lieutenants of infantry. She is the widow of each of them. She is in quite a abject poverty as either of the ladies whose names have been mentioned in this connection. She has not the same means as Mrs. Smith, and I think that some other ladies have; she is not able to bring so many influences, perhaps, to bear on members of Congress as other ladies are able to bring, but she is quite as deserving as any, and if this amendment is to be adopted, I shall propose to add the name of that lady.

Mr. WIGFALL. I trust that amendment will not be pressed.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not submit it now.

Mr. PUGH. I agree with the Senator from Louisiana, in a this Session, it is certainly not advisable to invade the general law on the subject of pensions. We know these cases have all been debated before; and if there is a demand for them now, if this bill is to have put on it first the case of one lady, and then another, I think the Senator from Louisiana is right. We have them all bundled together, and then lay the bill over until we can have a full Senate to vote upon it, and not vote on it now. If the bill is to be passed to a vote at present, I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator call for yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. PUGH. No, sir; I do not object to any one of the cases more than another. I presume they are all alike.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have hitherto been opposed to the granting of special pensions in opposition to the general provision of the law; but I desire to express my thanks to the Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, for his remarks to-day, which have led me to change my position. I stand, up to the present time, regarding these pensions as somewhat anomalous in a Government like ours. I did not look at the subject in the light in which it was presented to-day by the Senator from Mississippi; that is to say, that according to our republican form of Government, it is my duty as an officer to pay a bare subsistence for themselves and their families during their lives; that they are utterly unable to accumulate anything for the support of those they leave behind them; and when gallant and distinguished officers, who have rendered services to the country, and who have been rewarded by these three great men, General Smith, General Riley, and General Macomb; when I see officers like these leave widows who make application to their country for the moderate pitance of fifty dollars a month as a pension for the support of their families, I am very glad that the Senator from Mississippi has given me a basis on which I can give a vote for it. I will vote for the bill with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. HALE. I shall vote for these cases, every one of them; but I desire to enter my protest against a remark which has fallen from the honorable Senator from Louisiana, and that is, that we pay our officers a mere pittance. We are paying them, sir, a very high salary. We are paying our lieutenant general $18,000 a year; we are paying very many gentlemen in this city—I have not the Register before me, but I think we are paying pensioners who do no duty, except to go to their offices and spend from three to five hours a day there, four, five, and six thousand dollars a year, and I think in some instances higher than that. I wish to know where the book that was published last year showing these allowances. We are paying them altogether too much; and if the pensions for these widows rested upon that consideration, I should vote against them. But I shall vote for them, because I think it is due to them, in accordance with the policy that the Government has adopted in similar cases heretofore. You have paid to the widow of General Worth, and to the widow of General Gaines, this sum, and I believe these widows are entitled to it. While I vote for these pensions, I hope that the session will not pass away before we shall pass a bill cutting down some very extraordinary and extravagant allowances that are made to our Army officers, in accordance with the principle of the bill that was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs at the last Congress, and which received the sanction of this body, and failed to become a law through the action of the other House, principally, I believe, for the reason that it reduced the lieutenant general from $10,000 down to the pitance of ten or twelve thousand a year. I hope to see these abuses corrected; and I am willing that the Government should be able to support, should be based on an appeal founded on such a ground.

Mr. PUGH. I do not wish to say anything against any of these bills; but I object to this logging of bills. Let each case come up in its moment. I am moved to vote for the case of the widow of General Smith, and I do not know but that I shall vote for the others. I voted for the bill for Mrs. Gaines and for Mrs. Jones. I am willing to vote for any proper case that can be fairly stated; but this getting of three or four or five cases together, and then passing them, is in favor of one shall vote for all, seems to me to be a very creditable system of legislation; and, the Committee on Pensions having reported against one of these very cases that is now offered as an amendment, and there being no report from the committee on the others, and no report from a committee, it seems to me we are departing from all prudence. Let us take the original bill, put it out its passage, and then, if it can be shown that the Committee on Pensions have erred in regard to the case of Mrs. Jones, it is a matter for me to bring in a bill for her; but I think this connecting of all these cases together is wrong, and if it be adhered to, I shall certainly vote in the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, to add every case of every widow that can be suggested, because there certainly is as much propriety in adding all as there is in adding two.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I merely desire to say one word in reference to the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not mean to answer what he has said, but I increase my anger. I will support the passage of the bill by so much, but I desire to enter my protest against what he said, and to say that I shall answer him heretofore.

Mr. HALE. There is protest against protest. Mr. IVERSON. I think this whole session is one of mere hours, in which we are passing a pile of justice. The Senator from Mississippi, and the Senator from Louisiana, say they are ready to vote for this bill, because our officers get a mere subsistence, and when they die they leave their widows poor, and therefore they are entitled to the generosity of the Government. Now, I assert the fact, that the officers of the American Army are better paid than the officers of any army in the world. The French officers are not paid as well, the British officers are not paid as well. What is the pay of a brigadier general in your country? General Taylor, General Wool, about eight thousand dollars a year.

Mr. DAVIS. Is the Senator able to tell us what the Duke of Wellington received as a military officer up to the time of his death?

Mr. IVERSON. The Duke of Wellington was an extraordinary and exceptional case, and we have made the case of General Scott exceptional. We gave him $33,000 to start with, giving him a lieutenant general's pay back I do not know how long. The Duke of Wellington fought the battle of Waterloo, he had a vast amount of property conferred upon him by the British Parliament. But it is literally true that the officers of the American Army are better paid than the officers in any foreign service.

Mr. DAVIS. How would the Duke of Magenta's pay compare with that of some of our generals?

Mr. PRIMES. I ask the Senator from Georgia if the legislators of America are not paid higher than those of Great Britain?

Mr. IVERSON. I apprehend not near as well as the legislators of some Governments. Some one familiar with the matter, behind me, says we are paid anything like the legislators of France. In Great Britain they do not get any pay regularly from the Government, but get much greater pay in some other way. But to come back to the original proposition, I say that the officers of our Army are better paid than any army in the world, and they are better paid than any other officers in the American Government. They are much better paid than our naval officers, and you propose now to increase the pay of naval officers to bring it up to that of the Army officers.

A brigadier general in the American service has from seven to eight thousand dollars a year,—more than twice as much as any Governor of any State of this Union, except California; and there is not a colonel of your Army that does not get from thirty-five to forty-five hundred dollars a year. It is increased every five years in his life. He gets an additional ration at thirty cents a day per ration, for every five years' service. So it goes on; and the second and first lieutenants of your Army get from eighteen hundred to two thousand dollars a year. Men who are just out of their academy, who are uneducated, and who have nobody to support but themselves, are paid from fifteen hundred to eighteen hundred dollars a year. Where in the world are there men who receive better salaries? Nowhere. Here is an officer of the Army who comes to you, and begs for only a vacancy for a vacancy occurs there are five hundred applicants for it. They press the Government for these offices; they urge their appointment; they demand it at the hands of every friend they have. They are constantly boring members of Congress, and everybody who has any influence, to get them these appointments; and when they get them they go on and spend their money and then come to the Government to support their families. That is the long and the short of it. There is no justice in it, in my opinion; it is a monstrous thing, it is taking money out of the pockets of the honest yeomanry of the country to pander to the extravagance of your officers and their families.

What right have you to take my money, or anybody else's money, to give away to these individuals? There is no justice in it; there is no right in it. You levy taxes upon the poor classes in the country, put them into your Treasury, and then take out their money to feed and fatten the Army officers and their families, to whom you pay much higher salaries than you pay to any officer of the Government. We get it, it is true; but I apprehend that our services, under all the circumstances, will compare favorably with the services of the officers of your Army; because, although sometimes they are engaged in the service of the country, perhaps three months out of every four they are carping "nimbly in a lady's chamber to the lascivious pleasing of a lute." [Laughter.] They are at any rate idle the greater portion of their time.

I do not intend to detract from the merits of the officers of the American Army. They are a gallant set of men, and perform service to the country, and are ready at all times to perform it, perhaps as gloriously as any men on the face of the earth; but I say the Government pays them well, pays them high, pays them quite as much as the Government of France. I voted for the increase of the pay of the Army officers; I then thought it was too low, but now I think it is high enough; and I am not disposed to put my hand into the Treasury, where the people's money has been deposited, to take out of it the money, and to sweat of the honest laborer and turn it over to the payment of the widows of officers of the Army, who, if they had been ordinarily economical and prudent, ought to have laid up enough for the support of their families. I think it is unjust; but I apprehend the case of Mr. Macdonald is just as good as that of Mrs. Smith. In the case of Mrs. Gaines, you gave her fifty dollars a month.

Did General Gaines contract a disease in the line of his duty? By no means. You gave fifty dollars a month to the widow of Adjutant General Jones, who died here, not of disease necessarily contracted in battle. Neither did General Smith. He died in his bed from ordinary disease, as I understand, and from no disease which he might not otherwise have contracted. The cases are not as strong, one as the other. I am against the whole system; but I hope the Senate will add on these amendments in this case, and then I shall vote against the whole system.

Mr. WIGFALL. Mr. President, I did not propose to join in this debate; I came into the Hall not knowing that any of these claims would be brought up for consideration, and I must confess that, like my friend from Louisiana, I have received some light on this question; and some impressions which I had, have been removed. I, unlike him, though, have been swayed in different directions. The eloquence and the arguments of my friend from Mississippi first induced me to look favorably upon these claims; but then rose the Senator from New Hampshire, and my friend from Georgia, and I am somewhat torn by conflicting emotions. If the two Senators last named be right, and I presume they are, I would suggest to them that they introduce a resolution, not a bill, that the Government should not pay out liberally to the lowest bidder. As a matter of course, it requires no education; it requires no ability; it is a matter of dollars and cents, and to the lowest bidder it should be given, as other Government contracts! Let us see how that would operate.

We are told that Army officers are paid too much; that they are paid $1,800 a year actually when they first come into the Army. Why, sir, there is scarcely a clerk in one of the Departments here that does not get $1,800, and he is required only to be able to make a receipt, and to be able to write a good hand; but a young man of capacity, one who would be an ornament to any position in life, who goes to the Military Academy, stays there for five years, has the capacity to comprehend all the sciences existing in the United States, and then he is ordered to make a soldier, who, when he leaves that academy, is almost ready to take the command of an army, (and we have seen during the last war with Mexico that this is true,) actually receives $1,800 a year! During the Mexican war we were without a single man of letters, without a command of brigades and divisions, but they called about them the education and genius of the Army, and traded on the capital that the Government supplied them, though that capital is paid $1,800 a year; and they won victories in a foreign land and added glory to the flag of our country. That is the truth, and there is no Senator in this Chamber who does not know that it is so; and that the compliments which have been paid to the militia and to the volunteers are a tribute to the West Point Academy.

Under these circumstances the question arises whether these things should be made on an occasion of this sort, first at the whole Army and then at the widows of these distinguished officers? I am as much opposed as any one to a squandering of public money, but I think it is not a very good economy, and sometimes it results in actual extravagance. You had much better pay a sufficient salary to officers in the Army and according to their grade, to induce men of capacity, men who can support themselves in other vocations of life, to remain there. It is economy to pay such salaries as would secure ability in the Army; but to reduce the pay to such an extent that no man who could support himself in any other avocation would go into the Army, is actually extravagance and a waste of money. You had much better have the Army.

When you consider that these are exceptional cases of giving pensions only to the widows of distinguished officers, it shows it cannot lead to any very great abuse, or to any great expenditure of money. It is a small sum, and it is easily guarded. There are but few. It is not every officer who occupies such a position, and before we have now three isolated cases I would be opposed to taking in the rank and file. I would be utterly opposed to extending this thing any further, and I am sure the widows of distinguished men, as I am told, in indigent circumstances, and asking this poor boon from their country. In compliance to the dead, and justice to the living, I shall vote for the appropriation.

Mr. GREEN. It is very important to have a certain number attended to in executive session.

Several Senators. Let us take a vote.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope we shall finish this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. [Mr. BAILEY in the chair.] The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, my colleague frequently tells us, no doubt very properly and justly, in his opinion, that we do not attend to the claims of citizens on this Government; but, in my judgment, the complaint is not well founded, for the very reason that occurs to-day. You may take up the Calendar, and you will find that probably ninety-nine out of a hundred of the cases on it are appeals, and wrong appeals, to the gratuity of the Government; and those are the large meritorious class of people from whom pensions are not withheld. I have seen, I know, take this original bill. The officer for whose widow it provides, had a brief but very brilliant career. He was a man who did the country much service. I knew him well; and he was one of the very best models of an officer. I had the highest respect for him. He entered the service probably at not a less compensation than three or four thousand dollars a year. Very soon it was carried from four thousand to five thousand dollars. He was in the Army probably not more than eight years of his life, and certainly not more than ten; and his pension averaged him more than five thousand dollars a year; which, I say, considering the claims on him, is higher than the compensation of the President of the United States. I say considering the claims; because there are certain social considerations that are on the President that are as unyielding as law.

This officer entered your service when he was perhaps sixty years of age, averaged $5,000 a year while he was in it, and now the American Senate is asked to pension his widow for life. It was wrong in principle, and I do not think it right, and I make the point with no desire to say anything against this officer, or the recipient of the bill. Perhaps no one sympathizes with them more than I do. Nobody would go further to relieve them, or would feel more keenly their destitution, their poverty, their grief. But, sir, we ought to base our legislation on principle. These special pensions are wrong and unjust to the country. You have laws by which, when a person who enters your service dies in the discharge of his duty, that is, if he is killed in battle or dies from wounds contracted in battle, his widow receives an allowance for so many years. That is a contract, not a gratuity, and that is right.

This, however, does not come within that rule. When a man enters the service as a lieutenant, as a captain, or as a general, he goes to a large country. His military colleague is perfectly correct in saying that, in the lower ranks in our Army, we pay higher than any Government in the world; and in that respect I think our system is the worst of all. The system in foreign countries, I think, is a good one—greatly better than ours. They put the compensation of their public servants on the value of that kind of talent which the Government demands, and when you depart from that rule you depart from all principle, and open wide the door to corruption. Now, you take a young man, probably at sixteen years of age, and educate him, and at twenty he comes out, and, if he graduates well, receives fifteen or sixteen hundred dollars a year at once. You keep him for forty years, until you want him, because in time of peace you have very little use for him, and even when you have war, for it seems, notwithstanding the large number of men we keep in service, that when there is a little Indian war you must have volunteers, and pay a million or two for them. You keep your Army to pay, not to fight, because, when the fighting is to be done, you go among the people and call on them to do it. That is your practice.

If it be proper and right that every person who serves the country in the Army ought to be pensioned, I put it to the senator, to the justice of every Senator here, is it just to the soldier, in just to the subaltern, who spends his days and nights in the public service, that he shall be allowed to die and leave his widow penniless, and his orphans without a farthing, if he has not been a distinguished man, if he has not been the friend of Senators and Representatives; if his wife is too poor, or if unable, from the misfortune of education, or other reasons, to come here and plead her cause before Senators, and get their promise to vote for a pension for her? If the pension be necessary, give it to all, fix it, make a rule. It is unjust and inequitable to give it to those who press you the most, or to the widows of the best and most influential men. Do justice to all the people; give to the poor and humble widow of the lieutenant or captain, who cannot come here to ask her petition. For like service, for a like term of service, for a like kind of service, for the like circumstances of death, if you intend to be just, give them all the same compensation. But when you act in the way now proposed, you violate a principle of justice; you do nothing but evil in the public service; you demoralize it; you are unjust to the country, unjust to the Army, and unjust to the public service.

There might be a case within the principle of the pension laws, within their equity, but not within the strict letter. That is a fair case for legislation, and the only case for legislation. This is not of that character; nor is it extraordinary in the circumstances. In the cases referred to by my colleague, the cases of Mrs. Gaines and of Mrs. Jones, they had friends here; they were most excellent people; they could wield an influence from their very virtues, well known to all of the public service, and they could plead equity or justice, nobody pretends it. Why does not the Military Committee bring in a bill that persons under the circumstances of these people—why does not my friend from Mississippi, if it is a just principle, bring in from his committee a bill to pension all persons under like circumstances? How many votes would it get here? It would not get him, I presume.

Mr. DAVIS. It is not the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs, or I should have long since brought in a bill expressing my own views on the subject. The Committee on Pensions think it belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs, I may do so yet.

Mr. TOOMBS. My friend and I both understand this business very well. Whenever we want a pension for a man, it is easy to get it. Any gentleman here is to do it, or I offer a resolution for his committee to inquire into it; and if he thinks the public interests demand it, if he supposes such a law would be necessary and proper for the country and the Army, it is very easy for him to get it before his committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the Senator from Georgia, whether, if he were to introduce such a resolution, he would send it to the Committee on Military Affairs, or the Committee on Pensions? Mr. TOOMBS. If it was for the Army, I think I would send it to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS. I mean just as you speak of. Mr. TOOMBS. If it is for military pensions, I would send it to the Committee on Military Affairs. I think it is in the most appropriate way. I do not think the Committee on Pensions ought to have anything to do with pensions, except to look into the cases I have named—cases within the equity of the law, but which, on account of the rules of the Department, or from some defect in proof, require an exception to the law. They may properly supply that defect, when a case is within the principle and the equity of the rule; but as for going out and taking up independent cases, I do not think they have any such right. Formerly, if you look at the reports of the Committee on Pensions, twenty years ago, when we had time to legislate, you will find that all pension cases were put upon principle; and I suppose it has been since I have been a member of Congress that the first one of these cases was passed that was ever put outside of principle.

I was a younger man, I had something to do with these matters in the other House, and I looked into them a good deal, and it was always necessary in your report to show the principle, and that the principle had been sanctioned by previous legislation. That was the ordinary tenor of the reports made to justify the action of Congress. Now, however, it seems that even when the proper committee report against granting a pension, any Senator feels at liberty to propose a bill for that purpose, upon the idea that it is only giving away the public money—giving it away to the widows of excellent people and meritorious officers, I admit; but it is against public policy; it is contrary to the interest of the public, or of the Army; it is unjust to the officers who do not get it, to the subaltern officer, and to the soldier himself. Why not extend this bounty to soldiers and their widows? They leave widows, and they leave widows destitute. In such cases, in ninety-nine instances out of a hundred, they are cases of total destitution. Take the mass of the fifteen thousand men you have got in your Army, and they would never be there, but for destitution. They are driven by want into the service; and of course, when they die, if they have families, they leave nothing for them but to be the inmates of poor-houses.

Mr. LANE. Will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. TOOMBS. I have done.

Mr. LANE. I will ask the Senate now to go into executive session. There is a case which is very important. I believe. We shall hardly get through with this matter this evening. It is important that there should be prompt action in executive session, before the mail goes out.

Mr. CLAY. I think it is well to call not quit this subject just now. The original bill is one for which everybody was willing to vote. Everybody was willing to allow the pension justly due to the widow of General Smith. I regret very much that three amendments have been moved which have occupied time. I think there will be nothing more said, and we can take the question now.

Mr. LANE. I think this bill will have a better chance at another meeting than this evening. We do not meet again until Monday, and it is important to have an executive session before the mail goes out to-day.

Mr. CAMERON. If the gentleman will promise me to help get up the original bill some day next week, I shall not persist.

Mr. GREEN. I will do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BAILEY.) The first question will be on postponing the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be not met on Monday next.

INDIAN TREATY APPROPRIATIONS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. HAYES, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 216) making appropriations for fulfilling the stipulations with the Ponca Indians, and with certain bands of Indians in the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington, for the year ending June 30, 1860; which was read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. FITZPATRICK, referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. GREEN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 2, 1860.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. T. McKITT TALLMAGE, of SYRACUSE, New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE DOCUMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement prepared by the Register of the Treasury, of the expenditures of money appropriated for the discharge of miscellaneous claims not otherwise provided for, and paid out of the Treasury during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, as required by the act of March 3, 1859; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MARCH 6, 1860.

NEW SERIES.....NO. 62.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. That does not apply to me; for, sir, I am not a member of any other committee. I only ask the same privilege that was extended to the gentleman from Texas on a similar occasion. He stated that he might be useful to his constituents on the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I—

Mr. OLIN. I protest against this proceeding. If the gentleman is dissatisfied with the decision of the Chair, he can take an appeal. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I have expressed no dissatisfaction, I have indulged in no reflection, but merely stated what was the action of the Speaker in constituting the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. If the House refuses to permit me to give the statistical information I have on the subject, shewing the injustice that has been done to my State, I will, by general consent, print it with my remarks.

Mr. CASE. The gentleman is not stating any reasons why he should be excused from serving on the Committee on Roads and Canals, but why he ought to be put upon the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I ask leave to publish the statistics I have referred to.

Many MEMBERS. Object.
The question was taken; and Mr. MORRIS was excused from further service on the Committee on Roads and Canals.

GEORGE F. BROTT.

Mr. WINDOM, from the committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of George F. Brott; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EBEN S. HANSCOMB.

Mr. WINDOM, from the same committee, also reported back a bill (H. R. No. 225) for the relief of Eben S. Hanscomb; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CASSIUS M. CLAY.

Mr. HOARD. I wish the unanimous consent of the House to submit a report from the Committee of Claims. I was not in the House when that committee was called in its turn.

There was no objection.
Mr. HOARD, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Cassius M. Clay; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES T. SCALFE.

Mr. HOARD, from the same committee, also reported back a bill (H. R. C. No. 89) for the relief of Charles T. Scalfé, administrator of Gilbert Stalker; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MORRIS NOBLE.

Mr. HOARD, from the same committee, also reported back a bill (H. R. C. No. 12) for the relief of Morris Noble; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

BILL AND PETITIONS WRONGLY REFERRED.

Mr. BRIGGS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House, that the Committee on Revolutionary Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the following bill, petitions, and memorials, which were wrongly referred to that committee:

The petition of Susannah A. Sawyer;
The petition of George Austin and others, soldiers of the war of 1812;
The petition of Captain Samuel Dennison and others, soldiers of the war of 1812;

The memorial of William Crossman, praying for a pension;

The petition of the children of Henry Briggs, deceased, praying for arrears of pension due to their father previous to his death; and

A bill for the relief of Samuel Winn, the only surviving child of General Richard Winn, a revolutionary officer.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

NEWSPAPERS SENT THROUGH THE MAILS.

Mr. COLFAX. I am authorized by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report a bill which, in its nature, is partly public and partly private. The Postmaster General is of the opinion that it ought to be passed at once. It is to correct a verbal omission in the Post Office law. That law authorizes publishers to insert notices and advertisements in their newspapers without extra charge, but it does not allow them to print anything upon newspapers except the address of the person to whom it is sent. A practice has grown up to print the address of the subscriber, and also the time at which his subscription expires. The Postmaster General says that ought to be the law, but that it is not; and it is to make it the law that I ask to report a bill. I send the Postmaster General's letter to the Clerk to be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, February 21, 1860.
SIR: I take the liberty to inclose a section having in view a slight modification of the act of 20th August, 1854, and to advise its immediate enactment. This will authorize publishers to send to their subscribers, upon each number of their publications, a "ledger account" of the amount due from them, the date when their subscription expires, &c.; an account which has been earnestly pressed upon the attention of the Department.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. HOLT.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, House of Representatives.

Mr. BRANCH. I have no doubts it is a very good bill, but I do not see in what sense it is even a private bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the gentleman will make no objection.

Mr. BRANCH. I will not.

The bill was read a first and second time, as follows:

A bill authorizing publishers to print on their papers the date when subscriptions expire.

The bill provides that the second clause of section three of the act of the 30th of August, 1855, establishing the rate of postage on printed matter, shall be so modified as to read as follows:

Second. There shall be no word or communication printed on the same after its publication, or upon the cover or wrapper thereof, nor any writing or mark upon it, nor upon the cover or wrapper thereof, except the name, the ledger account, showing the date when the subscription expires, the wrapper number, and address of the person to whom it is sent.

Mr. COLFAX. I will state that this bill was drawn at the Post Office Department. It meets their sanction and the sanction of the entire newspaper press. [Cries of "All right!"]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COLFAX moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROBERT H. MORRIS.

Mr. WOODRUFF, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Robert H. Morris, late postmaster of the city of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES PORTERFIELD.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Porterfield; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE YATES.

Mr. JACKSON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Dr. George Yates; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

MARYETT VAN BUREKIRK.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Maryett Van Burekirk; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

MAJOR JOHN RIPLEY.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Major John Ripley; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS CHANDONET.

Mr. FERRY, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Chandonet; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM THOMPSON.

Mr. FERRY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Brigadier General William Thompson; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM JOHNSTON.

Mr. FERRY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the orphan children of Colonel William Johnston; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

LOUIS MARNAY.

Mr. FERRY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Louis Marnay; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

CLEMENT GOSSELIN.

Mr. FERRY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Clement Gosselein; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

BAEL MYNAULT.

Mr. FERRY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the surviving children of Basil Mynault; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL MILLER.

Mr. FERRY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Captain Samuel Miller; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

JAMES BAPTISTE LABOUT.

Mr. FERRY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the heirs and descendants of James Baptiste Labout; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

THOMAS WILLIAMS.

Mr. FERRY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of atives of Lieutenant Thomas Williams; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN PIERRE AYOT'S REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. FERRY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Pierre Ayot; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

NEHEMIAH STOKELY'S HEIRS.

Mr. FERRY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Nehemiah Stokely, a revolutionary officer; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH TRAVERSIE'S HEIRS.

Mr. FERRY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Traversie, a captain in the revolutionary war; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH JEWETT'S CHILDREN.

Mr. FERRY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the orphan children of Joseph Jewett, a revolutionary officer who was slain in battle; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES OLIVER DUCLOEL.

Mr. NOELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Charles Oliver Ducloel, of the parish of St. Martin's, Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

N. K. DOEBLER.

Mr. AVERY, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 85) for the relief of N. K. Doebler; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

VALLEY LANDRY.

Mr. AVERY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Valley Landry; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

FRANÇOIS GUILLOIR'S REPRESENTATIVE.

Mr. BOULIGNY, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representative of François Guilloir; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

BRADFORD & COMPANY.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back to the House the memorial of Bradford & Co. I ask that the committee be discharged from all further consideration of the memorial, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to which it is believed it appropriately belongs. It was so ordered.

INDIAN SUPERINTENDENTS AND AGENTS.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I am also instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back to the House a bill (H. R. No. 161) to provide for a superintendent of Indian affairs for Washington Territory, and additional Indian agents.

Mr. STANTON. That is not a private bill.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I know it is not; but I only want to let the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON. Very well.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

W. Y. HANSELL AND OTHERS.

Mr. ETHERIDGE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 284) for the relief of W. Y. Hansell, the heirs of W. H. Underwood, and the representatives of Samuel Rockwell; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN JOHNSTON.

Mr. ETHERIDGE, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of John Johnston, of Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

INDIANS ON THE RESERVATIONS.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I am also directed to report back a memorial relative to appropriating money for the transport and settling of the Indian tribes on the reservation east of the Cascade mountains; and I ask that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, which has the subject under consideration, as I am informed. It was so ordered.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SCOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be allowed a clerk, to be authorized to employ the same, at a compensation of four dollars per day, while actually employed.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I object to the introductory part of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the resolution is in order.

The question was taken; and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SCOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES STILLMAN.

Mr. STANTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Charles Stillman; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

PETER D. ANCONY.

Mr. STANTON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the petition of Peter D. Ancony, and to ask that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, where it properly belongs. It was so ordered.

REPELLING INVASION OF OSAGE INDIANS.

Mr. BUFFINTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to pay to the State of Missouri the amount expended by said State in repelling the invasion of the Osage Indians; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

FREDERICK STEPHENS.

Mr. BUFFINTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Frederick Stephens; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CURTIS. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back a bill (H. R. No. 14) to secure the construction of a central Pacific railroad; and to ask that it be printed, and referred back to the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the call of committees now is for private business.

THE SPEAKER. That is so.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is no objection to any other but private business being reported.

Mr. CURTIS. I merely ask that the bill be printed, and referred back to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to that?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, I object.

The SPEAKER. Then the report cannot be made.

Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to furnish the House of Representatives with the memoir of the Mississippi sound, on the Mexican Gulf coast, with the maps and charts of the same as taken by the Coast Survey; also, to furnish the House with a statement of the amount of money at any time heretofore so appropriated by Congress for the naval and military defenses on the Gulf coast of Mississippi.

PACIFIC RAILROAD AND TELEGRAPH.

Mr. McRAE. I ask leave to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill to establish a Pacific railroad and telegraph, by railroad and telegraph, between the Atlantic States and California, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to that.

Mr. McRAE. I shall not insist upon it. I knew that it was out of order, but I thought that the House would consent to have the bill printed and referred.

DANIEL WRIGHT AND OTHERS.

Mr. OLIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made an adverse report on the petition of Daniel Wright and others, for the abrogation of a contract for the construction of a military road; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

BURKE AND WINDER.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel Martin Burke and Captain Charles S. Winder; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CORRESPONDENCE OF GENERAL HARNEY.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the same committee, also reported back the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the House the official correspondence of Brigadier General W. S. Harney, in command of the department of Oregon, relating to the affairs of that department.

JOSEPH B. EATON.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the same committee, also made an adverse report on the petition of Joseph B. Eaton; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS MEANS AND OTHERS.

On motion of Mr. PENDLETON, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Francis Means and others, of Oregon; and the same were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

CORRESPONDENCE OF GENERAL SCOTT.

On motion of Mr. PENDLETON, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of a resolution calling for the official correspondence of Lieutenant General Scott and Brigadier General Harney, in reference to the Island of San Juan.

Mr. LEAKE moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I rise to propose a privileged question. I ask the indulgence of the House for a moment, to explain an unjust imputation cast on me in regard to a resolution which I presented on Wednesday. I ask for the reading of a small paragraph from the Constitution of to-day, which I sent to the Clerk.

Mr. BURNETT. I would willingly indulge the gentleman from Iowa; but the point was made upon the other side of the House the other day, that a privileged question could not grow out of a newspaper article. I insist upon the enforcement of the rule then adopted.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement, without the reading of the paper? I can present the facts in a few moments.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no objection to the gentleman making a personal explanation, if it is understood that the privilege is to be generally but it was refused the other day to a gentleman upon this side who wished to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The objection is a good one, if insisted on. The gentleman from Iowa can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. CURTIS. I am sure the gentleman from Kentucky will not object to a moment's explanation which will remove an unjust imputation as to my having attempted to violate an agreement made by the two parties in this Hall.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. If it relates to anything in a newspaper, I object to it. It was decided the other day that newspaper articles could not give rise to personal explanations. That was a good decision; and I hope the House will adhere to it.

Mr. CURTIS. I surely ought to have the privilege of saying that the resolution which I presented on Wednesday was presented in good faith, with no idea of intruding on any arrangement; and that when presented yesterday, in the very same words, in full House, it passed unanimously. I had no bills and no other resolution to present on Wednesday.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. If members are permitted to notice all the newspaper attacks made upon them, we shall have no time for anything else.

MRS. A. W. ANGUS.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Mrs. A. W. Angus, widow of the late Captain Samuel Angus, United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHILDREN OF MARTHA SWILLING.

Mr. JUNKIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill to pay to the surviving children of the late Martha Swilling, widow of George Swilling, the pension which was due her for the period of her death, under the act of July 7, 1838; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES LACEY.

Mr. STORES, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to James Lacey, of Greengrass county, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN MADDEN.

Mr. STORES, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of John Madden, of Clay county, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CYRUS C. BLACKMAN.

Mr. STORES, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting a pension to Cyrus C. Blackman, of St. Helena Parish, Louisiana; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADELAIDE ADAMS.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to Adelaide Adams, widow of Commander George Adams, United States Navy; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MICAJAH HAWKES.

Mr. POSTER, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Micajah Hawkes; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TIMOTHY CAVAN.

Mr. POSTER, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Timothy Cavan, an invalid pensioner; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BARNETT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. Let us first get through with the reports of committees.
• The question was taken; and the House refused to adjourn.

NATHANIEL SMITH, DECEASED.

Mr. HALL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of the children of Lieutenant Nathaniel Smith, deceased; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. HANNAH McDOWELL.

Mr. HALL, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Mrs. Hannah McDowell; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WEBSTER S. STEELE.

Mr. HALL, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Webster S. Steele; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

OBJECTION DAY.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the Speaker whether this is not objection day in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar?

THE SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. MAYNARD. We ought not to let it pass without taking advantage of it; for, sir, we will have no other objection day until the fourth Friday of this month. Let us, then, go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar and dispose of the bills there in which there is no objection.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will remind the gentleman that the cases in that committee are mostly those adversely reported on. Some bills, I believe, were referred there yesterday; but I apprehend that they have not been printed, and that the reports accompanying them have not been printed. I think we will do more good by sending to that committee all the bills ready to be reported from the standing committees. I have no doubt that, by unanimous consent, we will make next Friday an objection day in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw my motion, approving of the gentleman's suggestions.

Mr. HINDMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HELPS. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his motion until all the committees are called.

Mr. HINDMAN. I insist on my motion.
Mr. BARKSDALE. I suggest that the Committee on Roads and Canals be passed over to-day, with the understanding that it be called next Friday. [Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. MALLORY. I have a report which I want to make from that committee. It is a bill, sir, in which my constituents are deeply interested.

Mr. FLORENCE. Reports of a general nature are not in order to-day.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not object to the understanding suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi.

THE SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is insisted on.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers.

Mr. BARKSDALE. There is no quorum present, and no business ought to be done without a quorum.

Mr. MAYNARD. A quorum is always present to be present. I hope that we will go through with the call of committees for reports of private bills.

Mr. BURNETT. I insist upon a count of the House. There is no quorum here.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I order. Messrs. GARLES and BINGHAM were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 24, nays 58; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House (at fifteen minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 5, 1860.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. GURLEY.
The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. HAUN presented the credentials of Hon. MILTON S. LATHAM, elected a Senator by the Legislature of the State of California, to the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. D. C. Broderick; which were read, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. LATHAM, and he took his seat in the Senate.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 27th ultimo, correspondence in relation to obstructions of streets, avenues, and public reservations in the city of Washington; which was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion of Mr. YULEE to print the report, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the establishment of a daily mail from the village of Lake Mills, in the county of Jefferson, Wisconsin, to the village of Okauchee, in that county, via Milford and Aztalan, in that county; and also in favor of the discontinuance of the mail route from Watertown, via Milford, Aztalan, Lake Mills &c., to Madison, between Watertown and Lake Mills; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADE presented the petition of S. K. Miller and others, praying that the militia of the Indian wars and that of 1812 may be placed on the same footing, in regard to bounty land, as those who served in the late wars with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. HUNTER presented the petition of Charles Maurice Smith, praying compensation for defending, at the request of the superintendent of Indian Affairs in Utah, the Indian Agency at Fort Hays, indicted for a criminal offense in the second judicial district of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BIGLER presented a memorial of Swain & Abell, and others, publishers of newspapers in the city of Philadelphia, praying an amendment to chapter fourteen, section one hundred and seventy-three, of the postal law of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented the petition of James Page, Eli K. Price and others, citizens of Philadelphia, praying Congress to grant a pension to John L. Kinsick, a quartermaster in the Navy, who was wounded by the bursting of a cannon on board the United States steamship Princeton; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of soldiers of the war of 1812, residing in Berks county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to allow them a pension for their services in that war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Armstrong county, Pennsylvania, for the establishment of a mail route from Kittanning to Leechburg, in that county; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented the memorial of George W. Bonnin, praying to be awarded an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions and a memorial adopted at a convention of soldiers of the war of 1812, held at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, on the 20th of February last, requesting the necessity for the immediate passage of a law granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GREEN presented the petition of A. Armstrong and others, praying the establishment of a weekly mail route from Rockford, Iowa, to Albert Lea, in Freeborn county, Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. POWELL presented the petition of Locky

Simpson, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of F. W. Lander, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

On motion of Mr. CIESNUT, it was Ordered, That the memorial of James A. Black, special agent of the State of South Carolina, praying that said State may be refunded certain sums of money expended in the common defense of the United States, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. BIGLER, it was Ordered, That A. E. Ford, administrator of Augustus Ford, have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, it was Ordered, That the petition of A. S. H. White, praying compensation for signing land patents, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask leave, at the instance of an ex-member of Congress, to withdraw the papers in the case of J. B. Milton, and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims. I will state that there has been some difficulty in finding these papers, but it is believed they accompanied an amendment that was made to an appropriation bill during the last Congress. Leave was granted.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GREEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of Secretary, Ruttenberg, Faust & Co., praying indemnity for losses sustained in consequence of the Secretary of the Treasury not adhering to the terms of the proposals for the ten million loan under the act of 14th June, 1858, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 245) for the relief of Secretary Ruttenberg, Faust & Co. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom were referred the petition of the legal representatives of Christened and Miguel De Arango, praying the confirmation of certain land titles; the petition of the city of New Orleans, praying the confirmation of its title to one half of certain lands bequeathed to that city and the city of Baltimore by John McDonough; the petition of the legal and legal representatives of James Johnson, praying the confirmation of their title to certain land; and the petition of Joseph Reycaes, praying the confirmation of his title to certain lands in the State of Louisiana, claimed under a Spanish grant, and to be indemnified for such lands, embraced in his claim, as may have been sold by the United States as public land, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 246) to confirm certain land claims in the Florida parishes of Louisiana to the city of New Orleans and others. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 169) to amend an act entitled "An act to ascertain and settle private land claims in the State of California," passed March 3, 1851, reported it with amendments.

Mr. TEN EYCK, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Burnet W. Dole, son and heir-at-law of Enoch Dole, a surgeon in the revolutionary war, praying compensation pay, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

CONGRESS OF PARIS.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if, in his opinion, not inconsistent with the public interests, to furnish to the Senate copies of all correspondence on the files of the Department of State, not already communicated, relating to the propositions on maritime law and neutral rights by the Congress of Paris, (July 1856).

NEW MEXICAN LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. BENJAMIN. At the request of the Delegate from New Mexico, I offer the following resolution, and ask for its adoption:

Resolved, That all the communications from the General Land Office, and papers accompanying the same, relative to private land claims in New Mexico, that have not yet been definitely acted on by Congress, be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, for examination and report thereon.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

DEBTS OWING TO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BENJAMIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of further legislation relative to the collection of debts due to the United States, and the sale of lands taken by the United States for the payment of debts; and that it report by bill or otherwise.

POST ROUTE IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Washington to the Quartermaster's Office, from Newburg, Mount Ida, and Waldron, to Fort Smith, in Arkansas.

PRINTING OF A DOCUMENT.

On motion of Mr. BRIGHT to print a communication from the superintendent of the Capitol extension, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in relation to the construction of the dome and porticoes of the Capitol, Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

CONGRESSIONAL COMPENSATION.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. It will be recollected that before the last session of Congress, members of Senators were elected for the new State of Minnesota. They were here some time, and it was late in the session before they were admitted. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution to entitle them to compensation during the period that they were here under disability.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. No. 18) in relation to the compensation of Senators and Representatives in Congress elected from new States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. HAYES, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

An act (No. 237) for the relief of Anthony Schlander; and

An act (No. 241) authorizing publishers to print on their papers the date when subscriptions expire.

The message further announced that the House ordered, this day, the printing of the following documents:

Letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating additional estimates of appropriations for military service within the Territories of Oregon and Washington—ordered at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes.

Letter of the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the House, calling for information in regard to the New York Indian reserve west of the State of Missouri—ordered at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes.

Letter of the Secretary of the Interior, in reference to the report of the art commissioners—ordered at twelve o'clock and thirty-one minutes.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 90) to create an additional land district in Washington Territory, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and to ask the Senate to allow it to be put on its passage at once. That Territory is now embraced in one single land district, and the public service really requires that another land district should be established there at once. I hope the Senate will pass the bill without amendment.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands is to strike out all of the original bill after the enclosing clause, and insert:

That when, in the opinion of the President, it may be expedient for the Territory of Washington, the entire area to which the Indian title shall have been extinguished, or may hereafter be extinguished, lying east and south of the following described lands, and including the same, to be called the Columbian river district, namely: Beginning on the boundary line between the United States and the British possessions, the summit of the Cascade Mountains, at the nearest range line to the east line of range twelve; thence south on the nearest range line to the summit of said mountains, to the line of dividing range eleven and eleven north; thence west to the line dividing ranges six and seven west; thence north on said line to the third standard parallel; thence west to the Shoshone Water lay; thence with the Shoshone Water lay, including any islands therein, to the Pacific; the western boundary of said district above the line dividing ranges ten and eleven, and on the summit of the Cascade Mountains, to be adjusted by the Department of the Interior, as near the points before given as is consistent with the best of the public surveys; and the President shall be authorized hereafter, from time to time, as circumstances may require, to adjust the boundaries of the land district of said Territory, and remove the officers when the same shall be expedient.

Sec. 3. And he is further authorized, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or during the recess thereof, a register and receiver for said district, who shall be required to reside at the site of the land office, be subject to the supervision of the President, and to the jurisdiction, as is or may hereafter be prescribed by law in relation to the existing land office and officers in said Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

FLORIDA CLAIMS.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to take up the bill S. No. 230, with a view of making it a special order.

Mr. GWIN. I made a motion to reconsider the reference of the West Point appropriation bill to the Committee on Military Affairs; and I should like to have that question taken up and decided.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. There is a motion now before the Senate. I should like to have the Florida moves to take up, with a view to make it a special order, the bill S. No. 230, declaratory of the acts for carrying into effect the ninth article of the treaty of 1819 between the United States and Spain.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to make this bill the special order for Wednesday, the 14th of March.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to know what the bill is, before it is made a special order.

Mr. MALLORY. It is a bill to carry into effect our treaty with Spain. I will change the time to the 19th. I move to make the bill the special order for the 19th of March.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on taking up the bill.

Mr. MALLORY. I will briefly state the reasons for making the motion, if there is to be any objection to it. I did not anticipate opposition to my motion. I propose to make it a special order for the 19th instant, so as not to interfere with any other special order. The bill is S. No. 230; and if it be left on the Calendar, it will be taken up on its regular order, and will not reach the floor during the session. The bill has been defeated heretofore simply for want of time. Efforts have been made to bring it before the Senate, but there has always been a disposition to talk the bill out, as I conceive, and its merits have never been fully considered.

It is evident now that we have spent so much of the session, that unless it be taken up at a very early day it will not be disposed of. It is a bill of great importance; it involves large interests. It is to carry into effect a treaty stipulation. I have no objection to its being made a special order of March—to avoid interference with all other special orders. I will state, too, that various gentlemen who are friends of the bill will have to be out of the city; and unless it be made a special order before they leave, there will be very little hope of its passing. I shall have, myself, to be absent from the city.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senate will not make a special order of this bill, which, I understand, is merely to provide for a private claim; one which has been, I think, already before the Senate, and the Senate has decided against it, if my memory does not fail me. It ought to come up on Friday, upon the Private Calendar. It seems to me unprecedented to make a special order in that portion of the week which is devoted to public business, for a mere private claim. Let the Senator move to take it up on some Friday. I hope the Senate will not make the bill a special order.

Mr. GWIN. I should like to oblige the Senator from Florida, but I must oppose making any bill a special order hereafter. I want to have the Calendar taken up regularly. I have been waiting for three months to see if we could not get to the business on the Calendar, and I shall be compelled to oppose the making of all special orders that are asked for, from this time forward, under the hope and with the expectation that by that course we shall be enabled to proceed to the consideration of the business on the Calendar. We lose more time in debating questions with regard to the order of business than would enable us to go through our Calendar. Why, sir, it is a fact, I believe, that we have not called the Calendar regularly for two years, and in that time no public bill has been taken up, except in the way the Senator now proposes, out of its order. I desire to return to the old practice of taking up the Calendar in regular order. The first bill upon the Calendar is the most important measure that is before the Senate. I very much regret that I have to oppose the motion of the Senator from Florida, but I shall vote against all such motions hereafter; and I give notice that as soon as we get through with the morning business, I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the bills on the Calendar.

Mr. MALLORY. I regret much, after the manifestations which have been made, that I feel constrained to insist on this motion. I know there is a great deal of force in what the Senator from California says. My friend from Virginia may perhaps be mistaken in regard to the bill on the Calendar; but the fact stated by the Senator from California, that the Calendar has not been called regularly in two years, really shows what hulk change there is for the consideration of this bill if we adhere to the Calendar as it is. There are, perhaps, fifty bills of very little importance preceding this, and this has been for various sessions before Congress. I say again, it has only failed to pass because we have never had time to consider the bill fully on its merits. My friend from Delaware [Mr. Bayard] intends to discuss the bill thoroughly; and I am anxious to get it up as early as possible. The claimants have been before Congress at various sessions. We have pledged the faith of the country to pay them their money. They have been before the Court of Claims; they have been before the Supreme Court; and they are finally driven to Congress for justice. I hope we shall not get rid of the bill simply by the interposition of time preventing action upon it. It is one of first consequence, far more than fifty other bills on the Calendar; but if it must occupy its place on the Calendar, I shall regard it as a defeat of the bill. I must, therefore, insist on my motion.

Mr. BAYARD. I differ with my honorable friend from Florida. I think the bill has been here before the Senate; it comes before the subject of investigation before Congress in a variety of ways, during the last fifteen or twenty years. It was heard before the Senate prior to its going to the Court of Claims. I took no part in debating myself at that time; the Committee on the Judiciary, or a majority of them, having reported verbally against it, the then chairman of the committee discussed it at length in the Senate; and it was discussed on the other side; and the Senate, by a vote of three to one, after discussion, rejected it. That was when it came before us as an amendment to an appropriation bill. At the same session, in the House of Representatives, the measure came up as a separate bill; and, after discussion, it was rejected by a very decided majority. Subsequently to that, it went to the Court of Claims, and there it was rejected. I give you, for, I do not think, then, it can be pretended that this bill has not been heretofore considered and discussed.

I doubt, myself, the policy of making it a special order. That, however, is a question which depends on the pleasure of the Senate. I will give some labor, I admit. Anxious as I was to do justice to the case if I could, my first impressions having been formed by merely reading the treaty, and by the information derived from the then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, my friend the late Judge Butler, my opinions were against it; and having seen a great many other memorials, I did, at the last session, take the trouble to investigate the claim thoroughly, as I believe; and with some further reading, to refresh my reading of the last session, I shall hold myself prepared at any time that the Senate choose to take up the bill and having seen a great many other memorials, I did, at the last session, take the trouble to investigate the claim thoroughly, as I believe; and with some further reading, to refresh my reading of the last session, I shall hold myself prepared at any time that the Senate choose to take up the bill and having seen a great many other memorials, I did, at the last session, take the trouble to investigate the claim thoroughly, as I believe; and with some further reading, to refresh my reading of the last session, I shall hold myself prepared at any time that the Senate choose to take up the bill

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved to take up the bill indicated by the Senator from Florida, with a vote to make it the special order for the 19th of March.

Mr. GWIN. In order that we may test the question, and see whether the Senate are going to take up the Calendar, and stop this plan of making bill special orders, by which we shall never reach their Calendar, I ask for the yeas and nays on this proposition.

Mr. MALLORY. Very well; let us have the yeas and nays upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If no objection be made, the Chair will put both motions at once. It is a double motion, that the bill be taken up and made the special order for the 19th of March. If no division be called for, the motions will be put together. On this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken—yeas 32, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bigler, Bingham, Bright, Broome, Cameron, Chandler, Cushing, Collier, Dixon, Durkee, Fessenden, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Fox, Green, Hale, Hildreth, Knapp, Knowlton, Mason, Fessenden, Rice, Wilson, Howard, Simmons, Sumner, Trenchard, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Briggs, Coombs, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Grimes, Gwin, Hammond, Lester, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Hunt, Lincoln, Nicholson, Rensselaer, Sillist, Wadsworth, and Wilkinson—20.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill was made the special order for the 19th of March, at two o'clock.

SALE OF ARMS.

Mr. GWIN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of business on the Calendar. Let us take up the Calendar in its regular order.

Mr. DAVIS. There is an unfinished bill pending, which I should like to have concluded. The unfinished business on which the Senate adjourned on Thursday last was the bill to provide for the sale of arms to the States, and for the appointment of superintendents of the national armories, to which the Senator from Maine [Mr. Fessenden] was about to propose an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from California, that he will call up the business regularly in order without a motion.

Mr. GWIN. Will the Calendar be taken up? I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business on the Calendar, and to postpone all other business. The Calendar has not been called up this session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator, that all business before the Senate is upon the Calendar, and he can call up any bill he pleases, and not on the Calendar.

Mr. GWIN. I want to call up the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the Senator will allow me a moment. The Senate adjourned with the Calendar before them, on Friday last, on the report of Mrs. Cameron of the Senate, and I suppose that is the business now in order. Is it not?

Mr. GWIN. That is a private bill, and comes up on Friday next.

Mr. CAMERON. It was postponed until Monday.

Mr. GWIN. And it will come up on Friday, which is private bill day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that when the hour for the consideration of the special order arrives, he will call it up. The hour has not yet arrived for the special order.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I hope we shall proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that there is no unfinished business.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senate adjourned on the bill providing for the sale of arms to the States on Thursday last, and the Private Calendar came up on Friday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then it can no longer be the unfinished business.

Mr. DAVIS. That special order is regard to the Private Calendar ended with today, and the business on which the Senate adjourned on the last regular legislative day was the bill to provide for the sale of arms to the States. The Senate adjourned upon it, the Senator from Maine proposing to submit an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think, with respect to the Senator from Mississippi, that that comes up as unfinished business.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I move to take up that bill for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to take up the bill in regard to furnishing arms to the various States.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the Senate will not take up any bill that will tend to debate, so as to interfere with the special order at two o'clock. I shall call, at two o'clock, for the consideration of the bill to amend the act establishing the Court of Claims, which was made the special order. This day was given to the Committee on the Judiciary for the consideration of that and other bills. It was made the special order for two o'clock to-day.

The motion of Mr. DAVIS was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 45) "to authorize the sale of public arms to the several States and Territories, and to regulate the appointment of superintendents of the national armories; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. Simmons to strike out the first section, as amended, after the enacting clause, as follows:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue in any State or Territory of the United States, on application of the Governor thereof, arms made at the United States armories, in any amount he may be required from the public supplies without injury or inconvenience to the service of the General Government, upon payment therefor, in cash at the time of delivery in each case, of an amount sufficient to replace, by fabrication at the national armories, the arms so issued."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I propose to amend that section, before the question is taken on striking out, if it be in order, by inserting at the end of the section the following:

Provided, That the whole number of arms which may be sold, as aforesaid, shall be ascertained and made known to each year by the Secretary of War; and no State or Territory shall be allowed to purchase a number of arms exceeding a certain number, to be ascertained and determined, than the Federal population of each State or Territory bears to the aggregate Federal population of all the States and Territories of the United States, according to the census of the United States next preceding such purchase.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the bill is before the Senate; but the Chair is informed by the Secretary of War, that it is not in order, which [two o'clock] calls up the special order; which is the bill (S. No. 53) to amend "An act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States," approved February 24, 1855.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to postpone the special order, with a view to finish this bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. In relation to that motion, I will observe that the Senate acceded to the Judiciary Committee this day, and to-morrow also, if it be necessary, for the disconnection of business that has been confided to that committee. At the last session of Congress we were unable to get up one of our bills; and to-day and to-morrow were given by the Senate expressly to that committee for finishing its bills. If a vote can be taken on the bill now before the Senate, that it be struck out, more than a few moments, I presume the chairman of the Judiciary Committee will make no objection to that; but if this bill is to be continned under discussion, I must insist on the special order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There will be further discussion.

Mr. COLLAMER. It will be discussed, certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think Mr. President, that the Senate will give us the time granted to us for the consideration of the business of the Judiciary Committee. Gentlemen on the other side say they mean to go on discussing this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not suppose they can discuss it at any very great length. They may have the discussion to themselves. I take it for granted that there will be no great deal of argument on the bill; but really I have been very often compelled to move to take up the bill, and then it has been laid down again. The last time it was under discussion we had approached a vote, when it was proposed to postpone it with a view to offer an amendment. Now the amendment is before us. It scarcely, I think, opens any new discussion. The bill has been discussed already. I do not wish to interfere with the proceedings of the Committee on the Judiciary; but I do not see how this bill can take up half an hour, even if gentlemen wish to speak upon it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust the chairman of the Judiciary Committee will insist upon his motion. It has been very truly said, that at the last session of Congress, that committee could dispose of none of its bills, because it matured several bills; because, when they were assigned for a particular day, something else was permitted to crowd them out of the way. Now, sir, I do insist, as day and to-morrow, if necessary, have been assigned to the Judiciary Committee, that they shall have them; and I trust the Senate will agree to it. If we are to pile special order upon special order, and then, when the time comes for the consideration of the special order, it is to be postponed to take up something else, we might just as well have no special orders. It is manifest that the bill which the Senator from Mississippi wishes to have considered now cannot be passed without discussion. I doubt if it could pass to-day, if we devoted the whole day to it. I trust the motion to postpone the special order will not prevail.

Mr. BAYARD. Is the motion made to postpone the special order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion before the Senate is to postpone the bill, with a view to continue the consideration of the bill to authorize the sale of public arms.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope this motion will not be acceded to by the Senate. Most of the bills, not but one of them, which the Judiciary Committee reported, were reported at the last Congress, and we were never able to get them up. It is true, as I stated the other day, they refer to no party relations, they embody no sympathy with party action, but they are all-important to the general interest of the country; and I do not think they have for one Congress been suffered to lie over without any action by the Senate at all, that now, when you have made them the special order, they ought to be postponed for a measure which has only arisen at the present session. I hope that the Senate will be this rule—going on with the special order. It does not follow at all, and I do not know that this bill will lead to any protracted debate. There are but two questions connected with it that can give rise to any. The debate cannot well extend on to the merits of the bill at all, because it embodies no party action. Being so confined, I do not think the debate can be long, and as to the mere amendments to the bill, I do not suppose there will be any discussion on them. I hope that the motion to postpone the special order will be agreed to. It is idle for the Judiciary Committee to report bills, and have questions of that kind referred to them, unless they are allowed a hearing before the Senate. One Congress has passed already with no hearing upon them.

The motion of Mr. Davis was agreed to, there being, on a division—yeas twelve, nays not counted.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 53) to amend an act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States, approved the 24th February, 1853. The bill as originally introduced by Mr. IVERSON, was read, as follows:

A bill to amend "An act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States," approved February 24, 1853.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two judges for the said court, to hold their offices during good behavior; who shall be qualified in the same manner, discharge the same duties, and receive the same compensation, as now provided by law in reference to the judges of said court; and that from the whole number of said judges, the President, in his discretion, appoint a chief justice, for said court.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all petitions and bills, praying or providing for the satisfaction of private claims against the Government, shall, without otherwise ordered by resolution of the House in which the same are presented or introduced, be transmitted by the Secretary of the Senate, or the Clerk of the House, with all the accompanying documents, to the court aforesaid.

Sec. 3. And be it enacted, That in all claims founded on legal or equitable obligation, and which might be enforced by a court of law, or equity, if the Government were suable, the said court shall have jurisdiction, and in such cases their judgment shall be final, as heretofore in such cases; and in every such case, upon the filing of their petition, whether the same be originally presented by him to the court, or be referred to it by either House of Congress, the same principles of adjudication shall be made applicable to both classes of cases.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That when the claim that is to be considered is founded on the claim of more than one party to the controversy may take an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, on the ground of law involved in the judgment of the said court, and mode of such appeal shall be regulated by such rules as the said Supreme Court shall establish for this purpose.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the number of three said judges shall be necessary to the rendition of final judgments; and in case of final judgments rendered by said court, and appealed by the said Supreme Court, where the same is in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and mode of such payment shall be regulated by such rules as the said Supreme Court shall establish for this purpose. And in cases where the judgment appealed from is in favor of said claimant, and the same is affirmed by the said Supreme Court, the sum due thereby shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and mode of such payment shall be regulated by such rules as the said Supreme Court shall establish for this purpose.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That in all cases so referred, where the ground for relief is not founded upon any legal or equitable obligation as aforesaid, but is addressed in the favor or against the Government, the court shall, on the application of the petitioner, order and direct the taking of the evidence as to the facts stated for relief, as in other cases, and when the same is completed, shall return the same to the House in which the petition or bill was originally presented.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of either of the Departments, before whom any claim of the claimant, and before he has decided thereon, to refer said claim to the adjudication of said court, the proceedings in such cases shall be regulated by such rules as the said court shall establish for this purpose. And in case of appeals from the said court to the Supreme Court, the same shall be satisfied and executed in the same manner as if such judgment had been rendered by the said Supreme Court; and in case of a copy thereof, certified as heretofore provided; and where such judgment is for a money demand, and there is no objection to the same, the sum due shall be paid out of which it can be paid, then the same shall be paid as provided for judgments in other cases.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, The jurisdiction of the court shall not extend to, or include, any claim against the Government, growing out of, or dependent on, any treaty stipulation entered into with foreign nations, or with the Indian tribes.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the judges of said court shall appoint a reporter, whose duty it shall be to report and publish the decisions of said court. And it shall be the duty of the said reporter to furnish a copy of the decisions of the said court to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the pay and compensation shall be the same as now allowed by law to the reporter of the Supreme Court.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with various amendments. The first amendment of the committee was to strike out the first section after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two additional judges for the said court, to hold their offices during good behavior; who shall be qualified in the same manner, discharge the same duties, and receive the same compensation, as now provided by law in reference to the judges of said court; and that from the whole number of said judges, the President, in his discretion, appoint a chief justice, for said court.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state the reason for proposing this amendment. The committee believed that it would be unwise at the present time to increase the number of officers by law; but that, if it was found by experience that the duties devolved on the court under the act were more than the existing judges could transmit, then it would be quite sufficient time to enlarge the number of judges. The motion, therefore, is made to amend the bill by striking out that section which authorizes the appointment of additional judges of the court, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in line three of section two, to strike out the word "without," and insert the word "unless."

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is a merely verbal correction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in line one of section four, to strike out the word "the," and in line two, of the same section, to strike out the letter "s" from the word "claims," and insert "any;" so that it will read:

That when any claim thus adjudicated, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three of the same section, to fill up the blank with the word "three;" so that it will read:

That when any claim thus adjudicated exceeds in its amount the sum of $3,000, either party to the controversy may take an appeal to the Supreme Court, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line five of the same section, after the word "law," to insert "and on the facts;" so that it will read:

Either party to the controversy may take an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, on the points of law and on the facts involved in the adjudication, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines one, two and three of the fifth section, to strike out the words, "The concurrence of a majority of the judges shall be necessary to the rendition of final judgments, and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section five, lines six and seven, to strike out the words, "money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," and insert in lieu thereof:

General appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims.

And after the word "presentation," to insert, "to the Secretary of the Treasury;" so as to provide that after the decision of the court favorable to a claim,

The sum due thereby shall be paid out of any general appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims, on presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eleven of the same section, to strike out the words "the chief justice, or, in his absence;" so as to require the signature of the presiding judge to the copy of a judgment presented to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line five of the same section, to strike out "six" and insert "five;" so that it will read:

And in cases where the judgment appealed from is in favor of said claimant, and the same is affirmed by the said Supreme Court, interest thereon, at the rate of five per centum, shall be allowed, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the end of section five, to insert:

And provided further, That any final judgment rendered against the claimant, on a motion presented as aforesaid, shall forever bar any further claim or demand against the United States, arising out of the matters involved in the controversy.

The amendment was agreed to.

properly claims, but applications to Congress irrespective of any obligation on the part of the Government.

Mr. HALE. I wish the chairman to explain to the Senate why a provision of the fifth section is put in, excluding the consideration of claims growing out of a treaty. As a treaty is the supreme law of the land, I should think a claim growing out of that should be well submitted to them as anything else.

Mr. BAYARD. That clause was in the bill as referred to us; and the committee, after considering it, were of the unanimous opinion that we were not under obligation to offer anything of the kind. In general, where the Government is obliged to pay anything under a treaty, it almost invariably appoints a commission for the purpose of determining the matter, and therefore it was thought unnecessary to give jurisdiction of such cases to the Court of Claims; because, whenever a treaty is made which requires payments, we have a special tribunal to determine the matter, and that a judicial one. We thought it better not to throw the onus of such claims on the court, but to leave them as they arose under treaties to be properly considered.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to move an amendment, by adding a few words to the end of the fifth section—the eighth section of the original bill, now the fifth section by the action of the committee. This fifth section provides that “the jurisdiction of the court shall not extend to include any claim against the Government, growing out of or dependent on any treaty stipulation entered into with foreign nations or with the Indian tribes.”

I desire to add the words, “or on any action of the Government in its intercourse with a foreign Power.”

The object of the amendment is to exclude from the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims those claims which are purely political in their character. The claims which Congress has always desired to preserve under its own jurisdiction. I may instance, as one set of such claims, the French spoliation. Those are claims which Congress has always desired to act upon, of sufficient magnitude to require the action of Congress under any of its acts. The Government has always ought not to embarrass the passing of this bill in relation to the Court of Claims by any extraneous considerations of that kind. The bill is for claims of citizens against the Government in law and equity, but not those which arise out of political relations with foreign Powers. Those were intended to be excluded by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. TOOMBS. I move that the second section be amended by inserting in the second line, after the word “obligation,” the words “for a valuable consideration.” This is to exclude another class of cases—the class of gratuities, post-service pensions, which belong exclusively to the bounty of the Government; and for that purpose I propose to amend the second section.

Mr. BAYARD. I cannot think that the amendment moved by the honorable Senator from Georgia is essential; yet it would alter the whole character of the bill. How would you apply the words “for a valuable consideration” to a case founded upon the tort of a citizen of the Government, who is responsible? The bill is meant to cover that. The word “obligation” is not used in the mere common law sense; the word “obligation” is used in its general sense—meaning a duty to pay, arising accruing to a party, whether it arise from a tort of the Government or from a contract of the Government. If this was only to give power to the court under contracts, you might well insert the amendment; but I think the honorable Senator will find a court giving a construction to these words, “legal or equitable obligation,” would never consider a gratuity or pension an obligation. It is an imperfect obligation, and therefore not an obligation; so held by the civil law as well as the common law. If it is an imperfect obligation, as a gratuity always is, it is not an “obligation” within the meaning of the bill. There was no difference of opinion in the committee as to the effect of the language used in the bill. It certainly was not intended for a moment, as the honorable Senator will see, to include the cases that he means to exclude. In the original section the original bill provided for taking testimony in cases of gratuities and pensions. That we struck out because we did not want to throw upon the court the mere duty of taking testimony; we thought, as they had no jurisdiction in such cases, it would not be proper to give them the duty of taking testimony for us. I submit to him that, within the meaning of the language used in the bill, the words “legal or equitable obligation” can include no gratuity. A mere gratuity is certainly never an obligation.

Mr. TOOMBS. Probably I might make the gentleman agree with me—for we are at the same thing—by adding the proviso:

Provided, It shall not extend to post-service pensions.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection to the gentleman framing it in that way.

Mr. TOOMBS. Then I move to add to the second section:

Provided, That this section shall not extend to post-service pensions.

I think that would be the proper term. I make the distinction, because it is a wrong designation to talk of a contract being a pension. An allowance, provided for in advance for services to be rendered, is a contract, and I wish that kept in. But to illustrate my view: Congress passed a law a few years ago, which was construed by the courts as a very good answer for a portion of the Senator's arguments, in which he was greatly mistaken. This court decided that, under a gratuity, a pension law to give to the widows or children of somebody that was married at any time, they were entitled to arrears of pension. First, they confined it to those married before 1794. They decided a case probably involving two or three hundred dollars; but there was a million under it more than he says they decided. Congress properly overruled it twice or three times; held that that decision was wrong, of which I had no doubt. Where there is no valuable consideration or no tort, where there is nothing but a post-service pension, I do not think the judgment of the court should be final; for Congress ought certainly to keep its gratuities in its own hands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In the fourth section of the amended bill, as it now stands, I move to strike out the words, “out of any general appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims;” and insert in lieu thereof, “whenever Congress shall make an appropriation therefor.”

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire why the difference is?

Mr. HALE. I will state.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FETTERBURN.) The Chair will inform the Senator from New Hampshire that the words which he proposes to strike out, having been inserted in Committee of the Whole, it is not now in order to move his amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. I am opposed to the amendment. It seems to me it destroys the whole effect of the bill. The effect would be simply, under a different form, to reserve to Congress the right of action in each particular case. That would be the result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not in order at this stage of the proceedings. It will be in order when the bill shall be reported to the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Very well; I will offer it then.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended. The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the presence of the Senate to vote on all the amendments together, or on each separately? (“All together.”)

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HALE. I now move the amendment in the fourth section; in lines six, seven, eight, and nine, strike out the words “out of any general appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims;” and insert, “whenever Congress shall make an appropriation therefor;” so that it will read:

That in all cases of final judgment by said court, or on appeal by the Supreme Court, where the same is in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid, whenever Congress shall make an appropriation therefor, out of the moneys so appropriated.

A provision of article one, section nine, of the Constitution, is, that—

“No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law.”

In pursuance of that, it is indispensably necessary, I suppose, that an act of Congress should be passed for the payment of the money out of the Treasury; and therefore this bill, as it originally went to the Committee on the Judiciary, I apprehend, was obnoxious to that provision of the Constitution. It was unconstitutional because it required money to be paid upon the passage of a claim by the Court of Claims, without the intervening act of Congress. As it is in conflict with that provision of the Constitution which says no money shall be paid except by virtue of an appropriation made by law. The committee have amended the bill in this respect; but it strikes me they have got rid of the difficulty in form and not in substance, because, if I understand the bill as it comes from the committee, and has been now amended, there will be a general estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury of how much money is necessary to meet all the bills passed by the Court of Claims, and whenever that estimate comes in, and Congress appropriates it, they let go any jurisdiction they may have over any particular case and give up that discretion which the Constitution vests in them of making specific appropriations for individual cases and contracts on the Court of Claims. It is in favor of one hundred bills, and if $150,000 is necessary to meet those bills, although there may be a claim passed by that court which conflicts with the judgment of the Senate, and a large majority of them, yet they cannot refuse to pay it, and thereby denying the whole, as it is a general appropriation made to meet all those claims, and there is nothing specific about it. I am opposed to that feature of the bill, and I think the Congress should retain its jurisdiction over each individual case.

I do not believe in the great amount of injustice which it is said we are doing. I believe that fair, honest claimants get their due; and the difficulty is that a great many more get more than their due. The Court of Claims may possibly be of some service to the Government in the sense in which they have heretofore, as a committee to investigate and find out what the facts are, and report them to Congress, and leave each individual case subject to the action of Congress. I know that that court have reported claims, and a number of them in direct contravention of the principles of action which had been adopted by this body and by the other House; and we have refused to pass the bills, and I hope we shall continue to refuse to do so; but pass this bill, and that discretion will be given up. You lose a portion of that jurisdiction, of the discretion, which the Constitution intended you should exercise, and you confer it on this court. I am opposed to it. I desire to retain in the hands of Congress the jurisdiction and discretion which the Constitution vests here, and I am not willing to give it up to any other tribunal. It may be burdensome, it may be annoying to Congress; but it is a burden and annoyance which the Constitution devotes on them, and it is up to them to get rid of it. I think it is improper and unconstitutional to take it away from them.

Mr. BAYARD. I am in favor of the amendment of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire prevails, the bill, of course, in one of its objects, will be entirely defeated. The object is to relieve us from this jurisdiction, not on the score of autonomy and honor, as we are to have, because a legislative body is not competent, from its organization, to act on private claims; and yet the inevitable result is, if his doctrine be true, that there can be no appropriation unless you make a specific appropriation for each claim. That is what his amendment requires. Of course, in every case which comes up for an appropriation, there will have to be a separate motion; and the reading of the papers will be called for in each case; and there will be a revision of each individual judgment by Congress, which is a totally incompetent body for the purpose. Nearly all the evils of the present system will be preserved if the amendment prevails.

On the contrary, I am unable, myself, to see the force of the constitutional objection of the honorable Senator. I believe I have to look to the action of Congress, or look to the principle of the Constitution itself. Even the original bill, I think, is not obnoxious to the objection. Congress has constantly passed bills directing that, when certain sums were ascertained, they were to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and they have authorized them sometimes to be paid by commissions. All the claims under the Florida treaty were paid in that way, without any other appropriation than that, when ascertained, and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, they should be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. That is compelling and imperative legislation. But in this case the committee thought it wise and right that Congress should, without acting on the individual cases that come before them on their merits, (which they mean to trust, as a judicial decision, to the court, both as to the proof as to the law,) have the supervisory power of knowing, by return of the Secretary of the Treasury, what was the amount and the aggregate number of claims in each year; and they should make a general appropriation, and out of that general appropriation alone should the claims be paid. That certainly gives them a supervision, which is all that is essential. It requires an appropriation to be made by Congress before a single claim can be paid. It gives you that kind of supervision which is the only one that Congress can intelligently exercise.

I stated what is the fact as to the action of this court heretofore, that it has had all the past claims before it, as well as it will have in future, merely claims arising from day to day, and that, in five years, only $550,000 has been decreed in favor of claimants; that is about one hundred thousand dollars a year, or it is a little more; if you please, say one hundred and twenty thousand dollars. I ask honorable Senators if, within their recollection, a session of Congress has ever passed, before the constitution of the court, a law, in which there had not been a much larger amount paid for private claims? I speak independent of gratuities. Is there any great tax in that upon the Treasury of the United States? Yet it is a very fair estimate of what will be the probable average result. To the 11th of January, 1854, the claims reported since the past session of Congress amounted to about twenty-one thousand dollars. The amount of those reported unfavorably I have no memorandum of; I know many of them took very large sums indeed. The Government, therefore, is really paying out of the Treasury, in the experience goes, and, after all, experience as regards legislation should be the great guide of the legislator, the Government will not be injured by the passage of this bill; and yet, certainly, I have heard no justifiable complaints that cases are not heard fairly in this court, as far as the public has counsel; he is represented. The business is dispatched with as much promptitude as the mass of business ever could possibly be expected to be, and as it is, I believe, in any court of the country. The court has done its duty as regards claimants; done its duty on judicial principles. I think we have every reason to congratulate ourselves that it was originally established. I am satisfied that we shall have still more reason to do so if we make its decisions final, and only retain the supervision which the bill contemplates as to the supervision over the general amount that is to come out of the Treasury; and not to retain that which is one of the great evils of the past system—the right to pass judgment upon the particular case, and what measure will make an allowance for it. That involves the principle that arise out of the attempt to investigate particular cases by a legislative body, because, though the parties would have nominally the legal adjudication of the case by the court, they would be withdrawn from the fruits of the judgment, they would find that Senators, when an individual bill came up, would say, "Let us have the papers; if my judgment is not satisfied that that amount ought to be paid, I shall vote against it, though the court have decided in favor of it." That would be the result, you retain the power of appropriating money for each case. I do not think that necessary to guard the Government. I am sure it defeats the object of the bill. I hope it will not be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I shall be obliged to the Senator from Delaware if he will tell me how large a proportion of those claims which have been reported on favorably by the court, have been provided for by Congress.

Mr. BAYARD. Congress have paid by legislation out of the $550,000 reported during the Thirty-Fourth and Thirty-Fifth Congresses, $283,000. The others are still pending, unacted upon by Congress. There is a residue of less than two hundred thousand dollars. At this session there was reported to the Senate, up to the 11th of January, $20,000; and there have been subsequent reports made to the House of Representatives. I have not been able to get at the amount of the residue of the amounts of this session. Congress have paid $283,000 out of $550,000.

Mr. HALE. And if I am not mistaken, of that a pretty large proportion was in a single case—the Residue case.

Mr. BAYARD. That is true.

Mr. HALE. Apprehend, if you look at the Calendar, you will find that Congress have refused to sanction the principles adopted by the court in a large majority of the cases; and I think we should be very slow to let go our control over this court, when they are making decisions in, as I believe will be found, a majority of the cases—

Mr. FESSENDEN. There have been no decisions by Congress against them. They are pending.

Mr. HALE. But they have been here for years, and they cannot get through.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They cannot be got up.

Mr. HALE. There are good many you have got up that you cannot pass. I will tell you one principle that the court have decided that the Senate have decided against this session; and that is, that where a subordinate officer performs the duty of a high position, he is entitled to the salary of that higher office. I understand they have decided that.

Mr. BAYARD. In some cases they have; and yet I know that at the present session of Congress I have read one of their reports, in what I considered an exceedingly meritorious case, looking at the whole case and the usage of the Government, where they decided against the claimant.

Mr. HALE. When they have decided two ways on the same question.

Mr. BAYARD. I allude to the case of Mr. Pleasant. This court had to decide for the first time on new questions and new principles, without authority of any kind scarcely to support their decision. Every case, every question, has to be developed to its full benefits, must have time. They may have committed errors in their early decisions, no one can doubt, nor that they may do so sometimes hereafter. The only question is whether there will not be errors committed by a court of special investigation to be reserved by a body like Congress, if it undertakes to reverse the jurisdiction to itself.

Mr. HALE. I am not disposed to take up the time of the Senate on this matter. I think they understand the question. I should like to have the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. IVERTSON. I desire barely to give the reason why I shall oppose this amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. I did not hear the action of the Senate on the bill, but I might have given the same reason. Under this bill, with the provisions made by the amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary, when the Court of Claims pass their judgments, and they are certified to the Secretary of the Treasury, he will call upon Congress for an appropriation. He will accompany that call, of course, with a schedule of the cases, and the amounts in each case. Then, a general bill will be introduced to pay the whole amount. Whenever that bill comes up, any Senator who thinks there is a bad case amongst them, can move to strike it out; and then the merits of that case will be adjudicated by Congress. Under the provision of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, Congress would have to pass upon each case; the very difficulty we want to avoid. Congress would have to take up each case in its order, and pass affirmatively on each one; and there would have to be a separate bill introduced in every case—just precisely the condition we are now in. I do not think that that changes the present condition of things. The Court of Claims now pass judgments, report the bills to each House of Congress, and each House takes up those bills and appropriates the money, if they think the claim is right. The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire goes to that extent, and further; that each case shall be considered and investigated and decided upon by Congress separately and apart from all the rest; whereas, by the other plan, that suggested by the committee, the whole will come in a batch, and one that is a bad case can be excluded, if the Senate or House of Representatives think proper. That will save, I think, a great deal of trouble.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Georgia is certainly right in his view of the propriety of this thing. As the case now is, the court reports its decisions to the Senate, the Senate refers them to their own committees, these committees report on them, and if the committees report in favor of a decision and the Senate concur with the committee, the bill is passed and the money appropriated. That is the present system. Now the bill, as amended by the committee, contemplates an entirely different proceeding. It contemplates a passage, by the court, of a claim, without sending the bill for that purpose, or the decision, to Congress to be reexamined, but sending it to the Treasury to be there paid at once, without the intervention of Congress at all; and it contemplates further, that there shall be a general appropriation to meet private claims, and every claim that receives the sanction of the court is then to be paid out of that general fund, and there is no schedule of claims or anything else to be submitted to Congress. Congress, in other words, lets go its whole responsibility and gives it over to the court. It gives to the court the examination of a whole mass of cases, where it is decided, in favor of the claimant coming here, he is to go to the Treasury; and from the returns thus made, the Secretary is to estimate a general sum and send it here, and we are to pass it. There will be no schedule of the claims that we should not care will be nothing by which you can tell what the money is appropriated for, to what objects it is to go; but we shall pass the general sum, and then it will be taken as an approval of the whole by law.

I have had a little experience of the manner in which appropriation bills are constructed. I remember a few years ago an officer of the Navy came here year after year and asked that his salary might be raised from $1,500 to $3,000 a year, and we voted it down every year as often as it came up. I remember that, when the bill was introduced in Congress, I found that the Secretary of the Navy was paying him a salary of $3,000 a year, though we were voting every session that he should not have it. And I will tell you how it was done—this simple way. The Secretary of the Navy, when he was introduced, he had voted for $3,000 a year for this officer, and as we had voted all the money that he asked, we must have intended that he should spend it in the manner he specified; and so, though we voted every time that it came to us that we would not raise his salary, right in the face of our votes, the Secretary of the Navy paid it year after year, and went back and gave the officer back pay at that rate.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. What Secretary?

Mr. HALE. The case was all investigated, and the money was paid out of the Treasury, the least attention in the world, because it was a general specimen of the manner in which our money goes. Now, sir, I want to hold on to this position. I do not ask that each case shall come before us and be investigated, as is now done; but I ask that each claim shall be reported to the appropriation, so that if I sit here and see a claim made that, in my judgment, I believe to be utterly and totally wrong, I may vote against it. That is all I ask. If the Senate see fit to give up this power, the money will be retained in the Treasury.

Mr. IVERTSON. I think the Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken in two things. In the first place, he says the Secretary of the Treasury will not send to Congress a schedule of the cases. The bill, to be sure, does not provide for that; but I ask the Senator to look at the bill from New Hampshire. The bill calls on Congress for a general appropriation to cover the claims adjudicated by the court, he will, of course, send a schedule of the cases, that the two Houses may know to what claims the money is to be applied. I will make this suggestion to the Senator from New Hampshire, that, if the Secretary fails to do that, it is the easiest matter in the world for either the Senate or the House of Representatives to have such a schedule by calling for it. The Court of Claims certify all the cases to the Secretary of the Treasury. Then, by calling on the Secretary of the Treasury, by a simple resolution of either House, we can get every case that the court has adjudicated; and then each gentleman can look for himself, and decide which cases are bad, and which good, and he can move to exclude the bad ones. So there is no difficulty on that score. The Senator says that now, cases adjudicated by the Court of Claims are referred to our committee, and thus undergo investigation. The Senator is mistaken about that. The law which established the Court of Claims provides for no such proceeding. It provides that every bill reported by the Court of Claims shall go on the Calendar, and be considered and decided without any investigation by any committee of this body.

Mr. HALE. Are they not referred as a matter of fact?

Mr. IVERSON. The committees do not now investigate claims coming from the Court of Claims. It is true, that, at the commencement of the session, all the reports of the court, both favorable and adverse, were referred to the Committee on Claims; but, on full consideration and investigation of the whole subject, they came to the conclusion that it was an improper proceeding, and that there had been too much delay. They referred the matter and put on the Calendar, without any expression of opinion on their part in a single instance. It seems to me that the Senator is mistaken in that respect.

If the bill passes in its present shape, as reported by the Judiciary Committee, whose amendments have been agreed to by the Senate, there will be no difficulty; because if there be a bad case amongst the aggregate, any Senator or Representative can move to strike it out. Then there is the decision of the Court of Claims, with a full report of the proceedings, the arguments of counsel, the briefs, the testimony, the decision of the court itself, giving its reasons—all can come in review by the two Houses, and any improper case may be stricken from the list, and the Secretary pay the balance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am very clear, Mr. President, that something ought to be done in reference to the Court of Claims, and it makes very little difference to me whether the court be abolished, or whether we try to improve it. The objection to the establishment of the court is that we have cases investigated in some proper and legal manner, that Congress might in some way get at the true facts, and not be obliged to rely, as it always had done before, on ex parte testimony and means of which many very bad claims had been got through Congress. But, sir, owing to the fact that we gave the court no final jurisdiction, we accomplished that purpose, and that alone, in a certain number of cases; but we did not accomplish another object, and that was to rid Congress of that which consumed so great an amount of time and labor that had been expended here in the investigation of cases for which we, by the very constitution of the bodies, were an unfit tribunal.

There has been the experience? The experience has been with regard to suits, that the y have gone into the court with their claims under the invitation of Congress, pursued them all through the court at very great expense, and to their very great annoyance, (as all law suits are), and then the report made to Congress, and the advice given by Congress as a matter of course, or even adopted upon consideration; but for a considerable period they went to the Committee on Claims—they did while I was a member of that Committee, and have been so referred since. The committee ordinarily found that the decisions were correct and reported them back with a recommendation that the bills should pass. But, sir, after having invited claimants to go into this court, after they had gone through the court, obtained its decision and report from the Committee on Claims, each member of the Senate or this body considered himself at liberty to contest the claim just as much, if he did not like the decision, as he would have contested it originally on his own judgment against the decision of the court; and we all know that whatever may be the situation or the merits of a claim, and however it may stand, when a member of this body chooses to contest it here, such is our mode of doing business that it is almost impossible to pass it.

The consequence has been, in my judgment, the most gross injustice to claimants. It is unfair to invite a claimant to go into a court of your own creation where you appoint the judges, having the whole thing in your power, where they hold their judicial lives at your mercy, to put him to the expense of carrying his claim through it, get a favorable decision by the court, and then utterly refuse to do him any justice here. I have ordinarily, since the court was established, acted on the bill as it came, and I have never made a mistake on the part of the court, such as was manifest, I should consider myself bound by its decision. I acted on that principle while I was a member of the Committee on Claims of this body, and for the simple reason that I considered it a gross outrage and injustice to claimants, adding insult to injury, first to refuse to pay their claims here, and then to send them to a court of our own creating, and when they had been at the expense and trouble of getting a decision in their favor there, our evidence properly taken by a proper tribunal, to refuse to consider their case here, and that has been almost invariably our course of practice, and that is the reason why so many claims which have been adjudicated by the court have not been allowed here. They have not been allowed here, because they remain unsatisfied.

Then, sir, comes the question, whether there is any great danger in giving this court final jurisdiction? The result which we have witnessed heretofore will be the same hereafter, if the court does it; and hence, occurring this question, is there any very great danger in giving the court final jurisdiction? The bill seems to me to be very well guarded. It says, in the first place, if I understand it, that the court shall have final jurisdiction only in those cases where, if the United States were an individual, it would be subjected to a suit at law in equity, that is, not general equity; but, according to the principles of equity practice—a suit in chancery—there is no injustice in that. The case is then to be tried, being a suit properly brought. In other words, we waive our objection, if we are a party to a suit, to be subjected to a suit upon a claim. The court investigate the claim and send their decision here. The law provides for such cases only—not for mere gratuities or bounties, but for legal or equitable claims against us. They are investigated; they are adjudicated by a competent court, and if the law is against them, more than $3,000 the parties may go to another tribunal—the Supreme Court of the United States—and have a decision there. I do not see but that the bill is as well guarded as it can possibly be with regard to these matters. They are referred to final jurisdiction, to a certain extent, in these smaller cases which will not pay for repeated investigations. I see no particular difficulty about it, because the court itself is in our power, and if we find, at any time, that it is going beyond the limits of what we think to be right, is becoming, as we may imagine, corrupt, deciding cases upon bad principles, we can strike it out of existence at any moment we please; we can protect ourselves as members of the Government, and protect the people against any evil consequence arising from this court, except for a very short period of time while we are finding it out.

If there are no difficulties of this kind, why should we hesitate to give the power? The Senator from New Hampshire says, let us keep a check on it in our own hands, do not let us say that these claims shall be paid out of a general appropriation made for the payment of claims. He proposes to limit that by saying that there shall be a specific appropriation for each case; or, in other words, that we shall get back to precisely the point from which we started, and accomplish nothing; because then the debate will come up on the appropriation instead of upon the bill itself; and if any member chooses to object to an adjudication, that will be it is wrong, in his judgment, he will make a fight upon the appropriation, and according to the course of legislation, which we follow here, the result will probably be to defeat the appropriation, and let the claim remain where it was; thus only subjecting the claimant to additional delay and difficulty.

Let us do anything, do anything, let us do it with something which makes the power that we apparently give entirely inoperative, and avail nothing to the claimant. Let us do the thing in a mode to accomplish the purpose which we originally intended to accomplish by the institution of this court—which was, in the first place, to provide that claims should be properly investigated by a competent tribunal; that when they had been investigated by that competent tribunal and found to be correct, we being relieved of all the time and all the trouble and all the difficulty which arise from the very constitution of our body in looking into such matters, then the claimant should have his money. I think the principles of the bill are correct, yet, I am willing to let the Court of Claims should exist at all, it is very obvious that we ought to give it a power which will accomplish some of the purposes which were intended to be accomplished by it originally. Certainly, in my judgment, none of them have substantially been accomplished yet. I am willing to let the court longer under a new system; but if it is to stand as it has hitherto stood, with no more power than it has had, I should be for abolishing it at once; because I think it has utterly failed—not from any want of ability on the part of the court; not that I think the court has not done its duty; for, so far as I have read its decisions, I believe they are very sound in most cases, and based on correct principles, though, to be sure, there are some in which I disagree; but from its constitution, and from the manner in which it effect the purpose. I am willing, therefore, to give it this additional jurisdiction, and try it a while at that. If it shall then be found to have failed entirely, or the evils result which some gentlemen imagine, as I said before, we can put a period to its existence at any time that we may think proper. I am willing to try it still further; because I think it is important to us to have claims against the Government investigated upon the same principles that claims between individuals are investigated, and to have a decision made upon them in the proper way.

I would prefer that the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Georgia (Mr. Toombs) had not prevailed, because it necessarily introduces other questions with regard to other classes of claims. I am willing to let the court have power to submit to the decision of the court a claim which arises under a law passed after the service to which it applied had been rendered; but he confines the exception to cases of a similar character. I presume he refers to a particular class of pensions, which he has in mind. I have not a considerable number of years. Undoubtedly there might be some reason for that exception; but the reason arises not so much from the question itself as from the amount it involved. In my judgment, however, the amendment is better, and I will settle that question. I did not oppose the amendment, because I think the honorable Senator is extreme in his views on the subject of pensions; and while there are difficulties of the same description arising under other laws, it would take too long a time, and embarrass the bill, to look them all up and make the proper exceptions. That will not hurt it in regard to other things, although I imagine it may produce injustice in regard to many honest claims for pensions arising under laws passed before the year 1860. I do not know the Senator looks on them all as mere gratuities; and, therefore, thinks they ought to be excluded. I presume that is his principle. The jurisdiction of the court under this bill will extend to cases arising at law and in equity. The cases arising at law will be according to the law, and though the law was passed after the service was rendered. It might have been a gratuity at the time; but the question, as a gratuity, was to be considered; I think, rather at the time the law was passed. The amendment to which I allude, introduced into the bill a principle not legal; but I shall not object to it further. I merely wished to show that I did not agree to that amendment.

Mr. HALE. It seems that I was not mistaken in regard to the course of proceeding in relation to these claims under the bill. I am glad to see the Committee on Claims have not adopted a different plan. Heretofore, they have always examined these cases, and I supposed now, from seeing on the Calendar, as to all the bills "reported by Mr. Iveson from the Committee on Claims"—so my Colleagues have been misled, and they have followed them, and would not make a report without consideration. But, as this bill stands, we let go all sort of control, and these claims may be paid out of a general appropriation—a fund appropriated before a single claim passes the Court of Claims—a general appropriation made; or, in other words, Solicitor of the Court of Claims here, when a claim is presented before that tribunal, addresses himself at once to the proper Department; the books are thrown open; the records are examined; the clerks are employed, and all the evidence necessary for the defense of the Government is near at hand. What would you do with such a case, if brought in California, or Oregon, or Washington, or any distant tribunal? Evidently the Government would be without efficient defense.

But there is another and a different objection, far more fatal to this idea of allowing the Government to be sued in any court. It is one which would place the Treasury of the United States entirely at the disposal of neighboring cliques. The money given to the Government in the district and circuit courts of the United States all over the United States, the cases would go before local juries; and those gentlemen might well profess alarm at the prospect of the disposal of the public Treasury under circumstances like those.

But here the sole proposition is, that whereas men are in the habit of coming to Congress, and presenting themselves with small claims for one, two, three, five hundred dollars—your record has a hundred such cases just now; and whereas these men have been in the habit of going by themselves, of going to the Court of Claims, and making good their claims, and obtaining judgments; and whereas it has cost Congress more time to discuss these matters than the whole of them are worth; and whereas it has cost the Government all reasonable defenses for the Government against improper claims by providing first judges, appointed by yourselves, next an advocate, appointed by yourselves, and thirdly, placing the court where it is under the eye of Congress, and making it a court which is located in duration to your own discretion, which you may at any moment destroy by repealing the law, you have got such guards thrown around the Treasury as suffice in warning you in making the experiment, if experiment you choose to consider it. I believe the bill rests on sound principle. It is well guarded; it was thoroughly discussed in the Committee on the Judiciary, and I feel confident that, if gentlemen will allow us to make this experiment, the claims against the Government will be adjusted on more equitable principles. They will be gone, and the Treasury will be better defended than ever. My principle we have yet had under this Government. Some gentlemen around me have said, and I participate fully in their opinion, that, of all the tribunals under heaven that could be devised for the purpose of adjusting our claims against the Government, this tribunal of which honorable Senators around me are members is the very worst.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have not exactly attended to this discussion; but I suppose the limit of $2,000 which has been spoken of in secrecy as to those cases that may be carried up to the Supreme Court. Now, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the objection made to this amendment. The Senator from Louisiana says, that after you have made the Court of Claims, and if you have adjudicated the claims, decided it, and if we reserve the right to make specific appropriation, we shall certainly reexamine every claim. That is singular. After we have provided all the means to ascertain the just balance due to the juries, because we require the Secretary of the Treasury to give us the items, which he ought to do, so that we shall know something about the extent of the claims, it is said we shall certainly reexamine all the decisions. That is the reason he assigns. Now, I have no idea of reexamining these decisions, or of requiring the payment of any amount in magnitude to be passed upon by this court, it is well enough that Congress should know whether or not there has not been some bad management. I can see a very good reason in the argument of the Senator from Louisiana, that we should not examine the cases originally; and I believe it to be an effectual reason. I believe our unwillingness to go over these old matters will make us pass a thousand that ought not to be passed where we should reexamine one. That there is danger to the President in his being set that would involve this country in large engagements, large outlays from year to year, I have no doubt. I examined one decision about two years ago—

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Senator will permit me, this bill does not repeal the section of the former law which requires the Court of Claims to take up the cases every year.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to the interest. I think, if the Government do not pay when the balance is ascertained, they ought to allow interest until they pay the money; but I think we ought to have a particular account of our expenditures, and how what the money you appropriated for; we ought to have the Secretary of the Treasury annually estimate for sufficient to pay all these balances, and then we shall pay them. I have no idea that that will cause us to reexamine the cases scheduled in these old bills; but we ought to know where the money is going, and for what purpose; and it would be no very great trouble to publish a little book containing a statement of each claim and its amount; and if there was nothing very wrong in it, it would not be questioned.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do not intend to occupy time, but to make a single remark to my friends who seem to be so exceedingly apprehensive that dangerous encroachments will be made on the Treasury through this court. Out of the sixty-seven millions, invited to be expended, how much of it will probably be expended under the judgments of this court? It has been said $100,000 per annum would exceed that which our experience teaches us to be. How much of the money you speak of, of the sixty or seventy million that you speak of, will the $100,000 paid under the judgments of this court? The whole balance of the people's money is expended upon the judgment of executive officers in the Treasury Department. Which will be the best security for being judiciously and justly expended? Who settles all the accounts which we get in return for these millions? Executive officers, auditors, comptrollers, clerks, of every denomination.

It is upon their settlements, and payments made in virtue of their settlements, that all your money is expended; and yet, when you come to pay upon the judgment of a court, which has heard the cause openly, in the face of counsel on both sides, upon evidence recorded, upon judgments which are made in the report of, and upon judgments which are made in the report of, and upon proceedings which you call for at any day you please when Congress is in session—all is accessible to you, just as accessible to you as the records of any Executive office—where is the cause for alarm? If you do not tremble for the millions that are expended under the judgments of individuals that you do not know, that you never will know, that are liable to influences all around them more than courts of justice are supposed to be—if you can bear all that in patience and in security, why this panic about the judgment of courts of justice, where parties are suing openly, and have their rights decided upon by written and recorded opinions, for which the men who give them are responsible? It would be a great deal better if we could turn a portion of our attention to look after the sixty or seventy million that go on the judgment of others. I really think we may entertain some hope that the administration of this court will contribute to the purposes of justice, to the security of the people's money. I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment will be adopted, and that the experiment to be made which this bill contemplates.

Mr. BAYARD. The honorable Senator from Rhode Island objects to the bill, not because he says it is necessary or proper that Congress should reexamine the cases, but because he does not wish to know where the money goes. There is to be a general appropriation on an estimate for the payment of the judgment of the Court of Claims. Of course, the appropriation will be confined to that, and the court will be paid out of that appropriation. Then the bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury, at each succeeding session, shall return to Congress a list of the amounts of the judgments and the parties to whom he pays the money. Do you not know, then, where the money goes, a great deal better than if it is to all your general appropriations for any other service?

Besides, as I said before, experience is the great test of these matters; and as regards the fear of danger to the Government, I will present simply the return of the list of claims made on the 11th of January. The court are obliged to make returns, at the commencement of the session, of past decisions since the previous session. There are forty-five claims. Of those forty-five claims, there are five favorable reports, covering allowances to the amount of not quite twenty-one thousand dollars, and the others are adverse; and they cover an amount exceeding one million two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HARLAN. I am not certain that I understand the theory on which the Court of Claims was originally established. I have never understood that it was the intention of Congress to allow the Government of the United States to be sued; but that this court was to act in the capacity of a committee, but with superior advantages to any ordinary committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, before whom claimants may appear in person, and present the strongest evidence against the Government, or its acts, and be contradicted, and where the Government is usually unrepresented, where no one is interested in procuring rebutting testimony. The Court of Claims was established, I had supposed, to secure the Government against impositions that could not be so readily made against the Government as it is. However, I understand the effect of the bill now pending, it is to allow the Government, in certain cases, to be sued; to put it in the situation of a mere individual. If we are to reverse the theory upon which the Court of Claims was originally established, and allow the Government to be sued by claimants, I see no sufficient reason for compelling the people of Iowa, or any other remote State, who have claims against the national Government, to come to the capital of the nation to bring their suits, unless it be for the benefit of claimants, or attorneys here, perhaps members of Congress, who may intend to act as claim agents. Why should a citizen of Iowa be compelled to turn his back on the court of the United States in Iowa, and come to the District of Columbia to commence suit? Is the Government to tax the people of Iowa to be compelled to go to the capital of their nation to be taxed? Are the courts of the United States in Iowa without integrity?

The answer made to my inquiry by the Senator from Louisiana is, no, I suppose, considering that the records are all here. The original records are not produced in the Court of Claims, as I understand it, but mere copies of those records. How much time would be consumed in sending a copy of any record to the State of Iowa, and back to the State of Iowa for transportation? About fifty-six hours. This, then, is not a sufficient answer, as it seems to me; and if the Government of the United States is about to place itself in the attitude of an individual, and allow itself to be sued, I desire that the citizens of Iowa may sue in the Federal courts within the limits of the State; and if the Government of the United States should be dissatisfied with the result of the suit, provide for an appeal to the Supreme Court, and bring the whole matter to the capital of the nation.

The Senator from Louisiana objects, on the ground that jury trials would be a necessary consequence of allowing these claims to be sued in the district and circuit courts of the United States in the several States. To my mind, this is no objection. I have no objection to twelve or more men, properly selected and under their oaths, would be no more likely to decide unjustly against the Government than three men. The juries, I suppose, would not try the law involved, but merely the facts presented for their consideration. I have no objection to jury trials in other States by what I have observed in my own, I have no fear of submitting any claim to a jury of my countrymen. They would be as safe guardians of the Treasury as the judges of courts, and the only safe guardians of the Treasury that State regard this Government as their property would be as careful of the public money as they would be of their own treasure; would be no more likely to perjure themselves, to wrong the Government, than an individual party litigant.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Yes, Mr. President, I am surprised at the honorable Senator who has just addressed the Senate. Does he propose that we should make the United States suable everywhere, in every court, in every State, and submit Treasury accounts to a jury to be settled?

The report of the Secretary of the Interior, submitting additional estimates of appropriations for the Indian service in Oregon and Washington for the current and ensuing fiscal years—ordered at fifteen minutes after four o'clock.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting additional estimates of appropriations for the Indian service in Oregon and Washington; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 37th of February, requesting him to report the condition of the tract of land, west of the State of Missouri, set apart for the New York Indians, &c.; transmitting a copy of the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to whom the resolution was referred, together with correspondence therein referred to; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, acknowledging receipt of the House resolution of the 2d of March, asking for a copy of the report of the art commission, and stating that it had been referred to the Secretary of War for a reply; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House evidence in the several contested-election cases from Maryland and Nebraska; which, on motion of Mr. Borex, were referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

CHAPLAIN.

Mr. MILLSON. I am unwilling that the House shall seem to be indifferent to the discharge of a duty, and the perpetration of a usage which is coeval with our Government and identified with so many of our historic recollections. I therefore ask leave to introduce the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House will proceed to morrow, at one o'clock, p. m., to elect a Chaplain, who shall officiate during the present Congress alternately with the Chaplain already elected by the House.

Mr. AVERY. I desire to amend that resolution by substituting the resolution which was introduced last Congress upon the same subject.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to the introduction of the resolution; and a motion to amend is not in order until the resolution is received.

Mr. AVERY. Then I give notice that I will offer that amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, whenever it shall be received.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman from Alabama says he objects to the introduction of the resolution. I will then present that resolution as one of privilege. If there be any question of privilege it is certainly this.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Speaker decided that point the other day.

Mr. MILLSON. But I hope the Speaker, upon a reconsideration of the question, when he is told, as I now state, that there never has been the point of order raised as to this being a question of privilege but once, and then by the gentleman from Alabama; that objection it was overruled by the Speaker of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, who held that it was a question of privilege, and an election took place on that decision; I say, I hope the Speaker will decide, on reconsideration, that this is a question of privilege. There is but one single precedent, so far as I am informed, and it was then held to be a question of privilege.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose the Speaker will rule as he ruled a few days ago upon the same question. It cannot be a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, unless a Chaplain is, by law, a part of the organization of the House. There is no law for the election of Chaplain. It is true, that, heretofore, Congress, on many occasions, has seen fit to elect a Chaplain. The Constitution says that the House of Representatives shall choose its Speaker and other officers. Is the Chaplain an officer of this House? Where is the law for it? Where is the constitutional provision for it? By what authority is he an officer of the House? Then, if he be not an officer of the House, this cannot be a question of privilege; and I take the ground that he is not; for if he is an officer, the Thirty-Fifth Congress was never organized, because it had no such officer. I am willing to compromise with the gentleman from Virginia, and permit the resolution passed for the Thirty-Fifth Congress to be applied to this Congress. It seems that the Thirty-Fourth Congress—if the statement of the gentleman from Virginia be correct—decided against a point of order I then raised, as I do now, upon this same matter; but if it did, it is no reason why the Speaker of the present Congress should overrule the very sensible and truthful decision he made a few days ago.

Mr. MILLSON. The House having indulged the gentleman from Alabama, I desire to make a brief reply. The reference made by the gentleman from Alabama to the Constitution disproves his own conclusion. The Constitution provides that the House shall choose its Speaker and other officers. It is, then, a question of privilege for the House to choose its officers, whether it will or not. I do not say the House must elect a Chaplain; but I say it is for the House to determine whether they will have a Chaplain among its other officers. It is their privilege to determine what officers they shall have. In other words, as the gentleman from Virginia presents the question, whether it shall be the privilege of the House of Representatives to commence the discharge of their daily duties with a daily invocation of Divine assistance and protection, or whether they have so framed their laws as to make it the privilege of any one member, unmindful, it may be, of his own duties and obligations, contemptuous, perhaps, of all conventional decencies, to interpose his solitary objection, and obstruct and defeat the will of the House.

Mr. BURNETT. If it is in order, I want to reply to that part of the speech.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to know whether the gentleman from Virginia intends to apply his last remark to me?

Mr. MILLSON. Unquestionably not; and I say the gentleman from Alabama what was said by himself some time since, in reply to an inquiry under similar circumstances, I am surprised he should put the question to me. I mean only to say, that, according to his construction of the Constitution, the privilege of electing a single member, privileged, or ruffian, it may be, if such should ever become a member of this House, to defeat the will of the House. It will not do to answer that the House may, on Monday, suspend the rules; for a suspension of the rules implies that the rules, as now now stand, secure this privilege to a single member, in contempt of the wishes of the whole House. But I did not intend to enter into any discussion, and I conclude by asking the decision of the Chair upon the question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to state, in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, that I object.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to this debate, if it is not in order.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order. Mr. HOUSTON. The remarks of the gentleman from Virginia have been rather extraordinary, and I would like to say a word in reply to the very extraordinary position which he has assumed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Alabama may have a right to reply.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. Certainly there is. Mr. HOUSTON. Then I desire to state one fact, not in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, but as a matter of information to the Chair and to the House. Always heretofore, and in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, when the Speaker ruled that the election of a Chaplain was a privileged question, it was because there had been an appropriation made at the preceding Congress for the payment of a Chaplain for the next Congress. I state what is true, and what I know to be true, and what the books show to be true. There had been an appropriation made at the preceding Congress to pay salary to the Chaplain contemplated to be elected; and that appropriation was considered by the Speaker as a law which made the Chaplain an officer of the House. Hence it was that the Speaker decided that the Chaplain was an officer of the House, and that a motion to proceed to his election was privileged. But in this case that reason no longer exists; for there is no appropriation, no law, no authority, nothing from which we can infer, in even a remote degree, that the House of Representatives intends to have such an officer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say—

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire to refer the Chair and the gentleman from Alabama to a law of Congress fixing the salary of Chaplains to Congress; thus recognizing them as part of the legislative department.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am aware of that; but that law was virtually repealed by the action of the last Congress in refusing to carry it out.

Mr. CLEMENS. Not at all. There was a proposition made at the last Congress—

Mr. BURNETT. The Chair considers that debate is not in order; otherwise the Chair would be very happy to have the information which the gentleman from Virginia desires to impart.

Mr. CLEMENS. Sir, I cannot forget the fact that Mr. BURNETT, in his speech, said that the Constitution was framed, and when the Speaker had his chair in front of a picture of the rising sun, Benjamin Franklin rose in his place, and—

Mr. BURNETT. I object to the gentleman from Virginia being allowed to proceed unless we have a chance of participating in the discussion.

Mr. CLEMENS. Benjamin Franklin rose in his place and said, during the stormy discussions of the convention, that—

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to say that I object to this discussion unless we are to be all allowed to participate in it. I am opposed to this thing of electing Chaplains. I believe it is wrong in principle.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state his position.

Mr. CLEMENS. Before the Chair does so, I desire to refute the position taken by the gentleman from Alabama; and I believe I can do it by the law and by the record. I am sure there cannot be any rational objection to a gentleman rising and endeavoring to assist in the legislation of the country. Sir, I was referring to that act when the Federal Constitution was formed—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia cannot proceed unless by unanimous consent. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Borex] has yielded his objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will be happy to hear the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WINSLOW. Well, let there be a general debate on the subject, and I do object.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not object. All that I want is the opportunity of replying.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. BURNETT. If it be understood that we shall all be allowed to participate in the discussion, I will not object. But I do not believe that it is right to elect a Chaplain in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Virginia. If we are to have an opportunity to reply, I say to the gentleman from Virginia—

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I have an essay to deliver on the subject. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is now, whether the gentleman from Virginia will be permitted to proceed with his remarks?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not see that an objection is to effect anything. I have objected three times, and I have called on the Speaker stating that I did object; and yet the gentleman from Virginia proceeds in despite of my objection.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 7, 1860.

NEW SERIES.....No. 63.

Mr. CLEMENS. Well, I will waive the remarks which I intended to make, and will merely refer to the law of 1818, which will be found in Brightly's Digest, page 830. That law provides, under the head of "legislative department of Congress," that the annual salary of the Chaplain to Congress shall be $750. That law remains unrevoked. Brightly's Digest carries up the laws to the year 1857. Now I ask the gentleman from Alabama what he means by saying that the last Congress repealed that law? In addition to that—

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman asks me a question—

Mr. CLEMENS. One word more.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to know whether I am to have permission to answer the questions which the gentleman asks me? Will that be objected to?

Mr. DAVID, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOUSTON. Because, if so, I want to stop the gentleman where he is.

Mr. DAVID, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. CLEMENS. In addition, I desire to refer to the House—

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the Chair must enforce the objection. The Chair wishes to state that, when this question was up, the other day, the Chair was of opinion that it was not a privileged question. Since then, the Chair has looked into the precedents, and finds that they are in favor of the question being considered privileged. The Chair is not disposed to alter the precedents on this subject, and, therefore, decides that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia must be considered a privileged question.

Mr. BURNETT and Mr. MILLSON each addressed the Chair.

Mr. BURNETT. I believe I have been recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has recognized the Chair. The gentleman from Virginia. I rise to a question of order. Mr. BURNETT. I then offer, as an amendment to the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Virginia, the resolution adopted by the House in the Thirty-Fifth Congress.

Mr. BURNETT. I have in the resolution which I intend to offer as an amendment for the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURNETT. I am entitled to the floor, having been recognized by the Chair. I addressed the Chair first, and was recognized.

Mr. MILLSON. Having offered the resolution, I retain the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia has the way to the gentleman from Kentucky, and he has had the floor assigned to him.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to a question of order; which is, as to the right of the gentleman from Kentucky to the floor. I say that the gentleman from Kentucky could not take the floor from me without my consent. Having offered the resolution, and the Chair having only this moment decided that it was my right to offer it, I was on the floor, and the gentleman from Kentucky could not take it from me, except by my consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that to be the rule.

Mr. MILLSON. Then, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BURNETT. I insist that the gentleman had not the floor to move the previous question. What are the facts? The gentleman from Virginia offered a resolution, to which the gentleman from Alabama objected. The question was then made by the gentleman from Virginia, that the resolution was a privileged one, and that an objection could not prevent its being received and taken up. That question was submitted to the Speaker; and the Chair decided that the gentleman from Virginia was right, and that it was a privileged resolution. It thus came up before the House. I rose from my seat, addressed the Speaker, was recognized by him, and, under the rules of the House, I am entitled to the floor. That is the fact, and I ask by what right, under such circumstances, the gentleman from Virginia deprives me of the floor?

Mr. MILLSON. By the right that I had not yielded the floor, and that the gentleman from Kentucky could not take it from me.

Mr. BURNETT. I am appealing to the Speaker, and not to the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia being the introducer of the resolution, was, by the parliamentary law, entitled to the floor; and the gentleman from Kentucky could only get it by his consent. That is the parliamentary rule.

Mr. HOUSTON. As that is to be the ruling of the Chair, I desire to take an appeal.

Mr. MILLSON. I call the gentleman from Alabama to order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am rising to a point of order. I have taken an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I ask to have a vote on the appeal.

Mr. MILLSON. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. Then I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion; for I see there is a determination that we shall not have a fair vote on the contesting propositions, but that Chairmen are to be foisted on the people—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama will please state what decision he appeals from.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am perfectly willing to do so. I supposed that the gentleman from Virginia was so incoherently entitled to the floor this morning that I would hardly be permitted to state my appeal; as he, while I was on the floor, took it from me, I suppose, with the permission of the Chair, and moved to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has stated the point he desires to make.

Mr. HOUSTON. The point is this: The Chair decides that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia is one of privilege, and that it is in order to introduce it. From that decision I appeal. I make an objection to the introduction of the resolution on the ground that it was no question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the appeal.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Chair decided a few days ago in favor of the point which I made to-day; but the Chair being enlightened by the consideration which enrich the mind of the gentleman from Virginia, has now reversed his decision. From that decision I appeal.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not know that debate was not in order; and therefore I did not call the gentleman to order while he was discussing the matter—

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Virginia as moving to lay the appeal on the table?

Mr. MILLSON. I rose for that purpose. I have not yet made the motion, for the gentleman from Alabama contends that when I indicated the motion I was not entitled to the floor; and I merely desired to say a word upon my own behalf, and that was all. I am not one of those who are in the habit of addressing or attempting to address the Chair when other gentlemen are upon the floor. I beg the gentleman from Alabama to be assured that when I moved to lay his appeal upon the table, it was because I supposed that he had yielded the floor, or else I should have been guilty of the discourtesy of rising to address remarks to the Chair—not a very unusual practice here perhaps—when I was aware that another gentleman was upon the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I shall move to lay the appeal upon the table; and I beg the gentleman from Alabama to be assured that, even if the House should elect a Chaplain, there will be no great violation of the Constitution; and there will be no great harm done to the institutions of the country from daily appeals to Almighty wisdom to guide the councils and deliberations of this body. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

So the appeal was laid upon the table.

The question resumed upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MILLSON. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, for a single moment. It never was my purpose or wish, nor did I ever fancy that it was within the power of any one member, to prevent the House from deciding, as the gentleman from Alabama seemed to think I desired to do, between any competing propositions.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then, why not let in the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MILLSON. Because a vote upon that proposition would involve a double duty, and two votes upon two independent propositions, when the very same object may be attained in the mode I suggest to the House; and it is this: let those gentlemen who prefer to continue the system which has existed, and from which the other branch of the Legislature has already departed; let those gentlemen who are still desirous of maintaining and preserving that system, vote against the demand for the previous question. A vote for the previous question will indicate a preference for the resolution I have submitted, and in so doing we save the time of the House by having one vote instead of two. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask the gentleman from Virginia, as an act of justice to me, to withdraw the previous question, and from which the other branch of the Legislature has already departed; let those gentlemen who are still desirous of maintaining and preserving that system, vote against the demand for the previous question. A vote for the previous question will indicate a preference for the resolution I have submitted, and in so doing we save the time of the House by having one vote instead of two. Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well; I want the yeas and nays.

Mr. BARKSDALE. If the motion of the gentleman from Georgia prevails, the gentleman from Kentucky can then offer his resolution as an independent proposition.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am not particular about having the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table. All I want is vote on the motion.

Mr. CLEMENS. Very well; I will call for tellers on the question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Eliot, and Anderson of Missouri, were appointed.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to state that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AVERY] has already sent resolutions to the table; and if the motion of the gentleman from Georgia prevails, they will be offered as an independent proposition, and the same resolution can be adopted as was adopted by the late House of Representatives.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, but that system has failed entirely.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been already offered.

Mr. FLORENCE. No; the demand was withdrawn.

Mr. BARKSDALE. If the Speaker is right, I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. It is too late. The question has been decided.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I do not understand that the yeas and nays have been refused on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that they were refused.

Mr. BARKSDALE. My recollection is that the demand for the yeas and nays was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays were certainly refused on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I withdraw my motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. AVERY. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. AVERY. I rise to a point of order; and my point of order is this: I understand that the Chair has decided that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] was entitled to the floor upon the ground that the resolution he offered was privileged in its character. That resolution is, that this House shall proceed to the election of a Chaplain. I submit, if it be a privileged question to move to elect a single Chaplain for the whole session, that it is equally a privileged question to move that we proceed to adopt a resolution inviting the ministers of the several religious denominations of this city to alternate in opening this House with prayer. I think so.

The SPEAKER. That question does not, nor can it now, arise.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I insist on the yeas and nays on my motion.

Mr. MILLSON. I hope that the gentleman will be indulged with the yeas and nays on his proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I want the House to know that I am in favor of the proposition indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. AVERY].

Several MEMBERS on the Democratic benches. And so are we!

The resolution was again read.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask that the resolution indicated by my colleague be read to the House for information.

Mr. THEAKER objected.

Mr. MAYNARD. On a single objection avail to prevent its being read, when we are called to determine how we shall vote on this question? When the House is divided between the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, and the one suggested by my colleague, has not the House a right to have them both read?

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee is not before the House.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I wish to say to the House that the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee is the one that was adopted by the House of Representatives of the last Congress.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 116; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ashmore, Avery, Barksdale, Barrett, Boyer, Branch, Burgess, Branch, Bunker, Cragg, Davidson, John D. Davis, Fenke, Garrett, Hadenham, John T. Harris, Hays, Holman, Houston, Jackson, Jenkins, Jones, Labadie, James M. Leach, Logan, Love, Elbert S. Martin, Maynard, McCrendall, McClure, McRae, Miles, Montgomery, Sutherland Moore, Noble, Pendleton, Peyton, Pryor, Pryor, Pugh, Rogers, James C. Robinson, Rufus, William Smith, William N. H. Smith, Spinner, James A. Sprague, Thomas, Underwood, Vance, Waldron, Whitely, Windsor, and Wright—61.

NAYS.—Messrs. Charles F. Adams, Green, Adams, Adair, Alsty, Alley, Thomas L. Anderson, William C. Anderson, Adick, Babbitt, Bingham, Blair, Blake, Bragg, Briggs, Briggs, Brown, Burdick, Burdick, Burdick, Cade, Clemens, John C. Cochrane, Conkling, Cowan, Cowan, James Craig, Curtis, H. Winter Davis, Dawes, Deaton, Dwell, Evans, Blair, Edwards, Farnsworth, Felt, Florence, Foster, French, Gilmer, Goodrich, Grove, Hale, Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Haskins, Hutton, Helmick, Hickman, House, Hughes, Humphrey, Houston, Irvine, Jackson, Francis W. Kellogg, William Kellogg, Hewitt C. Leach, Leslie, Low, Lovell, Mackey, Mallory, Marston, Charles D. Martin, McKee, McKim, McPherson, Milburn, Milburn, John T. Moore, Morrill, Morrill, Edward J. Morris, Moore, Nelson, Nichols, Nixon, Olin, Foy, Porter, Potter, Pratt, Rees, Rice, Christopher Robinson, Boyce, Richards, Sedgwick, Sherman, Sumner, Sumner, Spaulding, Stanton, Stevens, Stevenson, William Stewart, Briggs, Stone, Stratton, Taylor, Thayer, Thayer, Tompkins, Train, Trumble, Vandever, Van Wyck, Watson, Caldwell, C. Watson, Ellis, B. Washburne, Israel Washburne, Wells, Wilson, and Woodard—116.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

Pending the above call,

Mr. COX and he was paired with his colleague, Mr. EDGEWORTH, and though in doubt whether that pair extended to this question, he preferred not to vote.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, stated that he was paired with Mr. VENABLE until next Monday.

Mr. GRALLAM stated that he was paired with Mr. DIMICK.

Mr. ENGLISH stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. KILGORE, for two hours.

Mr. HINDMAN stated that he was paired with Mr. KILLINGER for to-day and to-morrow; and that if he were allowed to vote he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, stated that on this question he was paired with Mr. FAIR, and that if he were at liberty to vote he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. MAYNARD stated that his colleague, Mr. QUABLER, was called home; and was paired with Mr. PERRY.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE stated that Mr. SICKLES was paired with Mr. FENTON until next Monday.

Mr. HOWARD stated that he was not within the hour when his name was called, and asked an unanimous consent of the House for leave to vote.

Mr. PHELPS objected.

The vote was then announced, as above recorded.

The question recurred on sending the call for the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I put the question to the Chair, whether, if the previous question be not seconded, the resolution of my colleague will be in order as an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then let us have tellers on seconding the call for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WALDRON and NOELL were appointed.

The question was taken; and the previous question was seconded, the tellers having reported—yeas 57, nays 35.

The main question was ordered; and the resolution was then adopted.

Mr. MILLSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to a question of order. I am in possession of a resolution submitted on the rules to submit a report; which I ask be received, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Thursday week.

It was ordered accordingly.

SENATE BILLS UPON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. BRIGGS. I rise to a privileged question. I move that the Senate bills upon the Speaker's table be taken up and referred to their appropriate committees. If there be objection, I shall move for a suspension of the rules. I hope, however, that there will be no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object, unless the gentleman will qualify his proposition, and allow the House to put such bills as it may desire upon their passage.

Mr. BRIGGS. I insist upon my motion as I have made it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and Mr. BRIGGS's motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS. I insist upon the execution of the order of the House which has just been made.

CHAIRMAN—AGAIN.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, the following is the proposition I wanted to offer a few moments ago:

Resolved, That the daily sessions of this body be opened with prayer.

Resolved, That the ministers of the gospel in this city are hereby requested to meet, and alternately perform their solemn duty, without compensation from the national Treasury.

I present it as a separate proposition, and I insist that I have the right to present it as a privileged question.

Mr. CLEMENS. It is not in order to adopt two discrete propositions on the same subject.

This subject has already been disposed of by the adoption of my colleague's resolution; and I make the point of order that the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee is not now in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that at present nothing is in order except the execution of the order of the House, made on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Batoka.]

In execution of the order of the House, the following Senate bills and joint resolutions were taken from the Speaker's table, and disposed of as indicated below:

GUADALUPE ESTUDBLO DE ARGUELLO.

An act (No. 117) for the relief of Guadalupe Estudillo de Arguello, widow of Santiago E. Arguello; which was read a first and second time by its title.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SCOTT. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

MARKET-HOUSE FOR WASHINGTON.

An act (No. 192) authorizing the corporation of Washington city to make a loan and issue stock for $300,000, for building a market-house; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

CAPTAIN HUDSON AND SANDS.

Joint resolution (No. 16) authorizing Captains William L. Hudson and Joshua R. Sands to accept certain testimonials awarded to them by the Government of Great Britain; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ASSIGNEES OF BOUNTY LAND WARRANTS.

An act (No. 197) in relation to the assignees of bounty land warrants; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

WILLIAM B. HERRICK.

An act (No. 217) for the relief of William B. Herrick; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask to have that bill put upon its passage. I ask the Clerk to read the bill.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Interior to first and second time by Mr. Herrick, late a surgeon of the first regiment of Illinois volunteers, upon the pension roll, at the rate of thirty dollars per month; to commence on the 14th day of May, 1858, to continue during his life.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to submit a statement to the House in reference to this case; and if a single gentleman objects, after hearing my statement, I will not press the matter. Dr. Herrick was one of the most eminent surgeons and physicians in my State. At the time of the breaking out of the Mexican war, he was persuaded to accompany the first regiment of Illinois volunteers to Mexico. He was upon the Rio Grande, and contracted that terrible disease in that climate, the diarrhoea, which proved to be chronic. Afterwards he was attacked by neuralgia, which deprived him of the use of his lower limbs. From all these causes he suffered so much as to be dependent on the use of crutches, and he is this day totally insane. He was an eminent surgeon; and, at the battle of Buena Vista, he dressed the wounds of the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi in the other wing of the Capitol, Colonel Davis, upon the field. The Senate unanimously passed the bill which is now upon the Speaker's table. There certainly never was a case which appealed more strongly to justice and humanity. [Cries of "All right!" "Pass the bill!"]

The bill was read to be read a third time; and it was read the third time, and subsequently passed.

GUADALUPE ESTEBILLO DE ARGUELLO.
Mr. SCOTT. I rise to a privileged question. I made a motion to order the Senate bill No. 117, for the relief of Guadalupe E. Arguello, widow of Santiago E. Arguello, to the Committee on Military Affairs. I withdraw that motion, and move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

DISBURSING OFFICERS.

A resolution (No. 4) to allow credit to certain disbursing officers therein mentioned, which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SWAMP LANDS.

An act (No. 26) to extend the provisions of "An act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits," to Minnesota and Oregon, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

TILMAN LEAK.

An act (No. 53) for the relief of Tilman Leak; which was read a first and second time. Mr. CLOPTON. I ask that that bill may be put upon its passage. The bill provides for the refunding of $679 57, the amount paid by Mr. Leak to the United States as the purchase money for fractional sections six and seven, in township No. 19, range north 38, in Alabama, at the sale thereof, as dead and abandoned Indian reserve, under the Creek treaty of 1839; provided he shall first surrender any patent he may have received therefor for cancellation. The bill allows no interest on the money so paid. I hope the bill may be allowed to pass.

Mr. BRANCH. I will remind my friend that the bill contains an appropriation.

Mr. CLOPTON. So did the bill which the House passed upon the solicitation of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN].

The SPEAKER. It is clearly an appropriation bill, and if objection is made, it cannot be put upon its passage.

Mr. BRANCH. I will not object, if nobody else does.

Mr. MOORE, of Kentucky. I object.
The bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

An act (No. 215) to amend the provisions of the fifth-sixth section of "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved the 24 day of March, 1799; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

JOHN A. FRONT.

A resolution (No. 7) for the relief of the legal representatives of John A. Front, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

JOHN SCOTT AND OTHERS.

An act (No. 22) for the relief of John Scott, Hill W. House and Samuel O. House; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

HARRIS AND BUTTERWORTH.

An act (No. 23) for the relief of Arnold Harris and Samuel F. Butterworth; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SIMON DE VISER AND JOSE VILLARUBIA.

An act (No. 39) for the relief of Simon de Visser and Jose Villarubia, of New Orleans; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RICHARD W. MEADE.

An act (No. 56) for the relief of Richard W. Meade; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

DAVID D. PORTER.

An act (No. 57) for the relief of David D. Porter; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

GEORGE B. BACON.

An act (No. 58) for the relief of George B. Bacon, late acting purser of the sloop-of-war Portsmouth; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SAMUEL A. WEST AND OTHERS.

An act (No. 59) for the relief of Samuel A. West, George McCullough, Hiram McCullough, and Charles Pendergast; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ANN SCOTT.

An act (No. 60) for the relief of Ann Scott; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MICHAEL NASH.

An act (No. 63) for the relief of Michael Nash, of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

JANE M'CRABB.

An act (No. 65) for the relief of Mrs. Jane McCrabb, widow of the late Captain John W. McCrabb, assistant quartermaster in the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

LIVINGSTON, KINKADE & CO.

An act (No. 69) for the relief of Livingston, Kinkade & Co.; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BRIGGS. I desire to have that bill read, and I will give to the House, after it is read, an explanation which, I feel satisfied, will convince the House that the bill ought to be put upon its passage. The bill was passed by the Senate unanimously, and it is one of those cases which I think appeals to the justice of the House, so that the parties interested may be indemnified for losses sustained by them under the circumstances stated in the bill.

Several MEMBERS. Read the bill.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Livingston, Kinkade & Co., merchants of Salt Lake City, Utah, the sum of $10,070, as indemnity for an amount of money of which they were robbed by a party of Sioux Indians, near Fort Laramie, in the month of November, 1854.

Mr. BRANCH. That bill makes an appropriation, and must, under the rules of the House, go to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. CONKLING. I object to the bill being put on its passage.

Mr. BRIGGS. This is a day on which it is in order to suspend the rules, and I will make a motion for that purpose. I am aware that there is a rule of the House which requires that all appropriation bills shall be referred to a Committee of the Whole House; but, as this is a day on which it is in order to move the suspension of the rules, I shall feel it my duty to make that motion. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRANCH] will hear the report read, I am satisfied he will not oppose the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRANCH. I feel obliged to object, because if we commence this system, we will never get through the reference of those bills. The bill has not been considered either by a standing committee of the House, or by a Committee of the Whole House; and the rules require that it shall be considered by a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. WINSLOW. Debate is not in order, and I object.

Mr. BRIGGS. Then I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. SHERMAN. That motion cannot be made, because the rules are already suspended. We are working now under a suspension of the rules, and the motion is not in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. Yes; we are acting under a suspension of the rules now, merely as to referring these bills; but not as to putting them on their passage. The suspension of the rules was their reference merely, and no human being supposed for a single moment that there was going to be any action on any of those bills to-day. There may be merits in the case of the bill referred to; I do not mean myself to make any objection to it; but I state what the agreement and object were.

Mr. WINSLOW. By the order of the House, the bills were to be taken up for reference merely. The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from New York is in order, and is not debatable.

Mr. BRIGGS. I withdraw my motion, satisfied that gentlemen are too impatient to hear the merits of the question. I now move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The bill was so referred.

GEORGE STEALEY.

An act (No. 71) for the relief of George Stealey; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EDWARD N. KENT.

An act (No. 74) for the relief of Edward N. Kent; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

RICHARD CHENEY.

An act (No. 77) for the relief of Richard Cheney; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FRANCIS HUTTMANN.

An act (No. 78) for the relief of Francis Huttman; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

TENCH TILGHMAN.

An act (No. 79) for the relief of Tench Tilghman; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

JEREMIAH MOORS.

An act (No. 80) for the relief of Jeremiah Moors; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ELIZABETH M. COCKE.

An act (No. 81) for the relief of Elizabeth M. Cocke, widow of Major James H. Cocke, late marshal of the district of Texas; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

W. D. MOSELEY.

An act (No. 89) for the relief of W. D. Moseley; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

HENRY ETING.

An act (No. 91) for the relief of Henry Etting; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CHARLES PEARSON'S REPRESENTATIVE.

An act (No. 229) for the relief of the legal representative of Charles Pearson, deceased; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. TAPPAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow that bill to be put on its passage.

Several MEMBERS. Read the bill.

Mr. BRANCH. I object to any bill being put on its passage under the order of the House.

that offers have been made to bribe, as inhuman in that resolution, nobody will object. But I do object to charges against any officer of the Government by innuendo.

Mr. BINGHAM. I object to this debate. It is all out of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When gentlemen will not make their charges upon their responsibility as Representatives upon this floor, I must object.

Mr. FLORENCE. I submit a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia has submitted a point of order; and until that is disposed of, no other question is in order. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FLORENCE. For the reason mentioned by the gentleman from Georgia—that there is a vague and indefinite something in these resolutions—I object to them. There is no use of reading them. If my colleague wants the rules suspended, he can have them, if he can get votes enough; but I will not sit in my place quietly, when such innuendoes as these are leveled against honest men. [Laughter.]

Mr. COVODE. If it will relieve my colleague, I will leave the navy-yards out.

Mr. FLORENCE. I have nothing to do with the navy-yards. I court investigation everywhere, and condemnation in the navy-yards as soon as I would anywhere else; and my colleague knows it. I am against corruption everywhere. Give me a reason for this investigation, and I will vote for it.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I do not mean to debate the resolutions; but I wish simply to say if these charges are vague and unfounded, they can be proved to be so by the investigation.

The Clerk then read the resolutions again, as above inserted.

Mr. COVODE. I call for the yeas and nays upon the suspension of the rules.

Mr. BURNETT. I wish to vote correctly upon this question; and, for that purpose, desire to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania—

Mr. GROW. I rise to a point of order. Upon a motion to suspend the rules debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman will make the charges specific, I will vote for the investigation; but I cannot vote for the investigation upon such vague charges as those contained in those resolutions.

Mr. COVODE. This is no time to make the charges specific and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Charles F. Adams, Green Adams, Adams, Aldrich, Allen, William C. Anderson, Ashley, Bassett, Bingham, Blair, Blake, Brigham, Briggs, Brewster, Buffington, Burlington, Burleigh, Case, Clayton, Cobb, Colfax, Conkling, Cooper, Corbin, Covode, James Craig, Davis, H. Winter Davis, John C. Davis, Deane, Delano, Doolittle, Edmunds, Farnsworth, Ferry, Foster, Fremont, Gillet, Gresham, Gross, Gurley, Hale, Hall, John T. Harris, Harkin, Hutton, Holmbeck, Hill, Humphrey, Hutchins, Irvine, Johnson, Francis W. Kellogg, William Kellogg, Kilgore, Lamber, James M. Leach, Lee, Loamie, Liverpool, Mallory, Marvin, Robert S. Martin, Maynard, McDonald, McKim, McKnight, McMahon, Millard, Lusk, T. Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Edward J. Morris, Isaac T. Morris, Morse, Nelson, Nye, Oakes, O'Brien, Olin, Orin, Pettit, Pugh, Reynolds, Rice, Rogers, Christopher Robinson, C. Robinson, Royce, Schwartz, Sedgwick, Sherman, William W. Smith, Spaulding, Stewart, Stanton, William Stewart, Stock, Stratton, Tappan, Tompkins, Train, Trimble, Vance, Venable, Wadsworth, Walden, Walcott, Caldwell, C. Washburn, Ellis B. Washburn, Leroy Washburn, Wells, Wilson, Winfield, and Woodruff—117.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashmun, Avery, Barstow, Barrett, Beane, Branch, Burck, Burnett, John B. Clark, John Cochrane, Burton Cragg, Crawford, Curry, Edmundson, Brewster, Gardner, Gillette, Gove, Hays, Hughes, Jackson, Jones, Logan, Love, Macfar, Charles D. Martin, McQuire, McKim, Miles, Milson, Niblack, Noel, Peabody, Peyton, Philip Reardon, Rogers, Russell, S. Smith, Stillwater, Stevenson, Thomas, Underwood, and Winslow—45.

So the rules were suspended, (two thirds voting in favor thereof.)

During the call,

Mr. ASHMORE, when his name was called, said: I desire to vote for an investigation if the charges are properly made—

Mr. GROW. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. ASHMORE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has no right to call me to order. The gentleman has taken it upon himself, frequently, since I have been here, to interfere with me, [cries of "Order!" "Order!"] and I would be obliged to him if he would keep his tongue silent when I am concerned. [Loud cries of "Order!"] I desire to vote for the resolutions if gentlemen will assert upon their responsibility that—

Mr. BINGHAM. I call the gentleman to order, and I call upon the Chair to enforce the rules.

Mr. ASHMORE. (amidst loud and continued cries of "Order!") I will not vote for an investigation merely upon insinuations and imputations like these upon the character of noble officers, made by those who will not take the responsibility of doing, and who have not the manliness to do what gentlemen ought to do. I say I will vote for the resolutions whenever the charges are properly specific. Now I vote "no."

Mr. HINDMAN. I am paired off, upon all questions which have a political bearing, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KILLINGER.] I therefore decline to vote upon this proposition.

Mr. LANDRUM stated that he was paired off with Mr. CASE.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina, said: While I am ordinarily willing to vote for an investigation of any charges made against any officer of the Government, ["Order!" "Order!"] or any department of it, I am determined not to vote for a resolution which charges corruption or malfeasance, under the cry of "Order!" as this resolution does, the highest officer in the Government—the President of the United States.

Mr. GROW. I call the gentleman to order. No debate is in order while the roll is being called, and I call upon the Speaker to enforce the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken; and the Chair hopes gentlemen will preserve order.

Mr. WINSLOW. I hope the House will indulge me in saying a few words.

Mr. GROW. I object to debate.

Mr. WINSLOW (amidst loud and continued cries of "Order!") said: I feel some hesitation about my vote. These resolutions are very vague and indefinite, large in their terms, and framed like French and Italian resolutions of ground and abounding in a multitude of general charges. I have perfect confidence in the integrity of the President and his Cabinet. Let any specific charge be brought against him, or them, and I will cheerfully yield the fullest investigation and accept the whipsnapper action I will do rendered to hinder, but everything to facilitate it. I cannot, however, vote for a committee on these sweeping charges. I vote "no."

Mr. BOGOC. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. BOGOC. I shall give some reasons for my vote hereafter; not now. I vote "no."

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Not having the slightest confidence in the accuracy of the charges preferred, I vote "ay."

Mr. GOMES said that he should have voted "ay," had he been within the bar when his name was called.

Mr. COBB. If my party is guilty of corruption, let it be ferreted out. I vote "ay."

Mr. MILES. Is my vote recorded? for I wish to put the record as voting against clap-net and humping.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is my vote recorded? I am as much opposed ["Order!" "Order!" "Order!"] to corruption ["Order!" "Order!" "Order!"] as any gentleman upon this floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order; and the Chair hopes gentlemen will preserve decorum.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will preserve decorum, of course.

Mr. MONTYON. I wish to change my vote. I vote under a misapprehension, and suppose that definite charges had been made against the Administration; but learning that the charges are general, I change my vote, and vote "no."

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Because no charges are preferred upon which an investigation can be founded—

Mr. GROW and others called the gentleman to order.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I suppose my friends will say I am in order, when I vote "no."

Mr. ASHMORE. No debate is in order.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I am proposing to vote "no." The gentlemen furnish me with the reason for it. Will the Clerk call my name?

The CLERK. Mr. COCHRANE.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. No. [Laughter.] Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I simply want to say, ["Order!" "Order!"] the resolution is unworthy of the men who draft it. ["Order!" "Order!"] Yes, sir, unworthy of the men who drew it. I vote "no."

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I desire to vote. I was not within the bar when my name was called.

Mr. FLORENCE. I must object, though I would like the men who draft it. ["Order!" "Order!"] Yes, sir, unworthy of the men who drew it. I vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

Mr. COVODE. I call for the previous question upon the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. NOELL. I desire to offer an amendment, and ask that it may be read for information.

Mr. COVODE. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. NOELL. I ask to have the amendment read for information.

Mr. BINGHAM. I object.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof, the resolutions were adopted.

Mr. COVODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRONTIER DEFENSES.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask leave to offer a joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read. It recites that information has been publicly circulated that the frontier of the Rio Grande is being ravaged by hostile bands of Mexicans, acting in sufficient numbers to prosecute hostilities successfully against the scattered settlements of American citizens in that quarter; that these hostile bands came from the territory of Mexico, if they are not instigated to their ravages by the Mexican authorities; that hostile Indians on the frontiers of Texas have been engaged in murdering citizens of that State, and in depriving them of their property for several years past; and that the citizens of Texas have been, and are, without the necessary military protection for their security; and it therefore appropriates $50,000, and places it at the disposal of the President, to pay the expenses of such a volunteer force as he may consider it expedient to the public interest to call into military service on the southern frontier of the United States, to assure the safety of citizens of the United States residing in that quarter, to vindicate the laws, and to insure their faithful execution.

Mr. BINGHAM objected to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to suspend the rules, in order to enable me to introduce the resolution; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My Speaker, if we adjourn now, will not this resolution come up the first business in order next Monday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STANTON. I would ask the gentleman from Texas whether, if the rules be suspended, he will consent to have the joint resolution referred to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. REAGAN. If it be the pleasure of the House that it should be so referred, I will make no objection.

Mr. BRANCH. It appears to me that this resolution ought properly to go to the Committee on Frontier Defense.

Mr. GROW. This debate is out of order, and I object to it.

Mr. BARSDALE. The resolution must necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole on the second day, because it makes an appropriation of $50,000.

Mr. REAGAN. My motion is to suspend the rules so as to permit the resolution to be introduced. The House can then dispose of it as it sees proper.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have submitted a motion that the House adjourn. I believe that is in order.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the Chair whether, if very sorry to do anything which should seem to question the authority of the Senate by modifying this resolution; the more especially as it has been taken from the precedents, and I think has been well conceived. If the witness has any reason satisfactory to the Senate why he did not appear, it will, of course, be received as an excuse, but as an excuse only. I hope the resolution will be passed in the shape in which it is offered.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is, in the first interrogatory, to strike out the words "what excuse have you for not appearing," and insert, "why did you not appear?"

The amendment was rejected.

MR. HALE. This is an extraordinary resolution, and as it is important to set a proper precedent, I propose this amendment, to come in at the end of the resolution:

And that the Sergeant-at-Arms allow him all reasonable opportunity to consult with counsel.

MR. MASON. I have not the slightest objection to that proposition in itself; but, of course, I take it for granted that if he desires to consult counsel in his relations to the Senate as a witness, the Sergeant-at-Arms will allow it. The Sergeant is only to keep him out of the room, not to interfere with the opportunity for adding such a provision, unless there is complaint that it is not done.

MR. HALE. This is a novel case—new in the Senate—and I suppose it is the right of the individual to have an opportunity of consulting counsel, and it should not rest in the after discretion of the Sergeant-at-Arms or anybody else. If we mean to give him this right, let us say so.

MR. KING. Mr. Hyatt, the party in custody, is a constituent of mine, and I consulted with me on this subject, and desired me, at the proper time—which I supposed would be after the adoption of this resolution, and the propounding of the questions to him—to ask for a delay of two or three days, which I had no doubt would be granted, for the purpose of having an opportunity to put in his answer, without indicating at this time what that answer will be in any way.

MR. MASON. I intend to follow the adoption of the resolution—still adhering to the usage; but, until it is shown to be wrong, that is the safest guide—by this order:

Ordered, That Thaddeus Hyatt be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms; and that he have until two o'clock on Thursday next, the 8th instant, to make answer to the questions directed to be propounded to him by the President of the Senate.

MR. KING. I will state that, in reply to the suggestion of Mr. Hyatt, I said that I had no doubt, though I was not at all aware of the intention of the Senator from Virginia to make the proposition he has just indicated, that the time he asked would be given to him. I understand that he asks for one day beyond that proposed to be given by the Senator from Virginia. His counsel are in Boston, and he would like to have one day more so as to be able to have them here.

MR. MASON. I have no objection to allow that additional day.

MR. KING. If he can have till Friday, or such day Thursday as the Senate shall deem proper, he hopes and expects to be able to put in his final answer to the interrogatories.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

MR. HALE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

MR. MASON. I submit to the honorable Senator that he withdraw that amendment. It only embarrasses and delays the action of the Senate. I will say to him frankly, that if, after the witness is remanded, any complaint is made that he is not allowed the freest access to his counsel, I will unite with the Senator in passing such a resolution; but I do not see the propriety, in advance, of suggesting that he shall have counsel, for it is equivalent to that. I hope the amendment will be withdrawn.

MR. KING. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that this question is one which would properly arise whenever it shall appear to the Senate that the witness in a case like this desires counsel. It may be that the witness is prepared at once to answer; that he has had sufficient counsel already; and that, therefore, no such thing is required. If, however, he makes a request for counsel, I have no doubt it would be granted. I suggest that that will answer the same purpose.

MR. HALE. As this is the first case of the kind in the Senate, as we are making precedents, and as the Senate are voting on a motion to precedents so closely, I want to have a good precedent here. As, however, it seems to be desired that my amendment should be withdrawn, and as I have no feeling about it, I will give my consent to withdraw it, but as the yeas and nays have been ordered, I propose it requires general consent.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment, the Chair hears no objection. The question now is on the yeas and nays.

MR. HALE. I want the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 49, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Briggs, Bright, Brown, Chandler, Claiborne, Clay, Clingman, Collamer, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Flick, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Foster, George, Granger, Harris, Hammon, Harlan, Hendricks, Hunter, Iveson, Johnson, of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Lane, Logan, Mason, Nicholson, Prioleau, Packer, Seabury, Howard, Simmons, Sibley, Ten Eyck, Thompson, Treadwell, Westfall, Wilson, and Yates—49.

NAYS.—Messrs. Buchanan, Durkee, Hale, Sumner, Wade, and Wilkinson—6.

So the resolution was adopted.

MR. MASON. I now offer the following as a final order:

Ordered, That Thaddeus Hyatt be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms; and that he have until two o'clock on Friday next, the 8th instant, to make answer to the questions directed to be propounded to him by the President of the Senate.

The order was agreed to.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will bring Mr. Hyatt to the bar of the Senate.

The Sergeant-at-Arms conducted Mr. Hyatt from the bar of the Senate to a spot a few steps nearer to the President's chair—Mr. Hyatt being supported on the right by Hon. PIERCE KINO, and on the left by Mr. ARMY.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. Hyatt, you are not expected to answer, at this time, the questions which, by order of the Senate, I am about to ask you; they are to be answered at a future time and under oath.

1. What excuse have you for not appearing before the select committee of the Senate, in pursuance of the summons served on you on the 24th day of January, 1860?

Are you now ready to appear before said committee and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said committee?

These questions you are to answer on Friday next at two o'clock, in writing, and under oath. Mr. Hyatt is remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The Sergeant-at-Arms then conducted Mr. Hyatt from the Senate Chamber.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

MR. SEWARD. Mr. President—

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must call up the special order at this hour.

MR. SEWARD. I hope that I shall be allowed to withdraw from the Chamber.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, by unanimous consent the Chair will receive morning business.

MR. BROWN. Is not the special order the one which I have the floor to-day?

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The special order for half past one o'clock is the resolutions of the Senator from Mississippi; but the bill from the Judiciary Committee in relation to the Court of Claims being the unfinished business, takes precedence of it in the order of to-day.

MR. SEWARD. I ask the consent both of the honorable Senator from Mississippi and the honorable Senator from Delaware to refer some papers without argument.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It can only be done by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

PETITIONS, ETC.

MR. SEWARD presented additional papers in relation to the claim of the American, Atlantic, and Pacific Ship Canal Company, of Nicaragua; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

MR. CLAY presented the petition of Thomas Kirkman, of Alabama, praying indemnity for losses caused by the failure and refusal of the Government of the United States to convey title to a section of land purchased and paid for by him; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MR. TRUMBULL presented the petition of William Petelska, only surviving child of Elizabeth Petelska, deceased, praying compensation in money or the privilege of locating other lands in lieu of a grant of three hundred and twenty acres of land made to his mother by the treaty made with the Delaware Indians at St. Mary's, Ohio, on the 3d of October, 1858; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MR. TOOMBS presented the petition of George W. Greene, praying the aid of Congress in publishing the life and letters of his grandfather, Major General Nathaniel Greene; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented the petition of A. C. Rhind, a lieutenant in the Navy, who was dropped by the action of the late naval board, and since restored to active service, praying to be placed on the same footing as other lieutenants to active service; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MR. DOOLITTLE presented two memorials of citizens of Wisconsin, praying the construction of a harbor and refuge at the mouth of the Fox River, on Lake Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MR. CAMERON presented three petitions of manufacturers, colliers, merchants, farmers, and others, of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, praying such a modification of the tariff as will protect the productive interests of the country; the abolition or a radical change in the warehouse system, and the substitution of specific for ad valorem duties; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate, the memorial of H. L. Galtner, praying such a modification of the tariff as will protect his business, and that of a laborer, during the time, he may be settled upon principles of justice and equity.

On motion of Mr. FITZPATRICK, it was Ordered, That the petition of Patrick Byrne, praying to be allowed the difference between the pay of a dockworker and that of a laborer, during the time, he performed such extra service, on the files of the Senate; be referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Rhin Elen Graveland, widow of Captain John H. Graveland, of the Army, praying to be allowed a pension, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the memorial of H. R. Schoolcraft, praying compensation for the collection of facts and material embodied in his historical statistics, condition, and prospects of the Indian tribes of the United States, prepared and published by him from the files of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

MR. FESSENDEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 248) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to receive deposits of guano," approved 18th August, 1856; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MR. KENNEDY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 251) for the relief of John B. Rutenhouse; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

MR. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing an act entitled "An act to provide for the Home Department, and to provide for the Treasury Department an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and a Commissioner of the General Land Office," and to transfer from the Secretary of the War Department to the Secretary of the Interior, the supervisory and appellate powers, in relation to the title and duties of the Assistant Secretary of Indian Affairs, and of restoring by law the said powers to the Secretary of War, as they existed prior to the passage of said act.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

MR. DAVIS, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print the message of the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, further information in relation to the heating and ventilating of the Capitol and the Post Office Department, reported in favor of printing the usual number, and that two hundred and fifty additional copies of the message, and two hundred and fifty additional copies of the previous message on the same subject, be printed for the use of the late superintendent of that work; which was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate, relative to contracts made by the Secretary of the Senate with Mrs. Adeline Sergeant for binding the reserved numbers of the Senate documents, submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary E. Castor, widow of Lieutenant Thomas F. Castor, praying a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 347) for the relief of Mary E. Castor. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Lemuel Wood, praying a pension, on account of disability incurred while employed as a waiter to a militia officer in the United States service during the late war with Great Britain, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 85) declaring the consent of Congress to any act which may be passed by the Legislature of the State of Alabama, authorizing the municipal authorities of the city of Mobile to impose and collect a duty on the vessels of vessels entering the port of Mobile, have reported it back to the Senate with an amendment. I wish to say that during the next week I propose to call up this bill and ask the action of the Senate upon it. I will then give the reasons why I ask its early consideration and passage.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the report of the Court of Claims adverse to the claim of Samuel J. Hensley, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 249) for the relief of Samuel J. Hensley. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FITCH, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a resolution of the Senate, relative to the expenditure of the appropriation for the repair of the light-house and pier at Chicago, reported in favor of printing the usual number; and the report was agreed to.

Mr. also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the superintendent of the Capitol extension, addressed to the Chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in relation to the dome and portico of the Capitol, reported in favor of printing the usual number; and the report was agreed to.

Mr. also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the usual number, and five hundred additional copies, of the report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in accordance with a resolution of the Senate, the correspondence on file in that Department in relation to obstructions of streets, ferries, and public reservations in the city of Washington, reported in favor of printing the usual number, and adverse to printing five hundred additional copies; and the report was agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Catharine Lydia McLeod, only surviving child of Ebenezer Markham, a Canadian refugee, praying relief on account of the losses and sufferings of her father in aiding the cause of the American Revolution, submitted a report, adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILKINSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Kate D. Taylor, widow of the late Oliver H. P. Taylor, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 350) for the relief of Kate D. Taylor, widow of the late Brevet Captain Oliver H. P.

Taylor. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. GREEN. There is a vacancy upon the Committee on Territories, caused by the expiration of the term of Senator Haun. It is important to have it filled. I move that the Vice President be authorized to fill that vacancy.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN. I move that the Vice President be authorized to fill the vacancies in the Committee on Indian Affairs and on Enrolled Bills, caused by the retirement of my late colleague.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. GWIN. I made a motion the other day to reconsider the vote of the Senate referring the West Point appropriation bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. I move to take up that question, which I believe is a privileged one, in order. I will not interfere with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN.] I give notice that, when I get the question before the Senate, I will ask, after he has concluded his remarks, to take up that bill. I merely wish to have the motion to reconsider taken in order that a vote of the Senate may be taken on the reconsideration, so that the question can then be before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California moves to take up the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th June, 1861.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN. I move to reconsider the vote by which it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the question now pending. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion to refer the bill, with the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GWIN. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Mississippi; but as soon as he concludes his remarks, I shall call the bill up for the consideration of the Senate.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The business before the Senate is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. No. 53) to amend an act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States, approved February 24, 1855.

Mr. BROWN. I hope I may have the consent of the Senator from Delaware to postpone that bill for say an hour and a half, with a view of referring to the consideration of the special order.

Mr. BAYARD. I am very loth not to accede to the proposition of the honorable Senator, but I do not see the right to the Committee on the Judiciary, to have the bill, which has been reported and been under discussion, postponed until it is disposed of. There will be ample time afterwards for the honorable Senator to take up his resolutions. Two days were, I understand, assigned by the Senate to the Committee on the Judiciary—yesterday and to-day. We did not complete the bill under consideration yesterday, which certainly, in my judgment, is of great practical importance to the people of the country; and unless the Senate so order it, I cannot consent to such a postponement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi moves to postpone the unfinished business of yesterday, with a view to take up his resolutions, which is the next special order.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I understood the motion of the honorable Senator from Mississippi to be to postpone this subject until he gets through with his speech, and then that we shall go on with the business of yesterday.

Mr. BROWN. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will give it that construction.

PROPERTY IN THE TERRITORIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions offered by the Senator from Mississippi are now before the Senate.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I ask, before proceeding with my remarks, that the resolutions may be read.

The Secretary read them, as follows:

Resolved, That the Territories are the common property of all the States, and that it is the privilege of the citizens of all the States to go into the Territories with every kind of description of property recognized by the Constitution of the United States, and held under the laws of any of the States; and that it is the constitutional duty of the law-making power, as above described, to protect the rights of the citizens, whether by the Congress, or by the Territorial legislatures, to enact such laws as may be found necessary for the adequate and efficient protection of the same.

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to insert, in any bill they may report for the organization of new Territories, a clause declaring it to be the duty of the Territorial Legislature to enact adequate and sufficient laws for the protection of all kinds of property, as above described, within the limits of the Territory; and that, upon its failure or refusal to do so, it is the admitted duty of Congress to interfere and pass such laws.

Mr. BROWN. When I introduced these resolutions, Mr. President, I acted under a deep sense of duty. I have seen the southern people excluded from most—inferior, from all but the best—the organized Territories of this Union with their slave property; and I believed that the same thing would occur in reference to the Territories about to be organized, unless Congress interposed its authority to protect the rights of the free citizens of the Territories about to be organized, moved resolutions which looked to direct, immediate, and positive protection to the slave property. As to the Territories already organized, I soon after introduced a bill looking to the overthrow of their unfriendly acts, and to the substitution of laws friendly to the species of property. In all these I sought what I believed to belong to the southern people under the Constitution; nothing more. At one time I supposed these resolutions would meet the approbation of Democratic Congresses generally. I have been disappointed in that respect. I have, however, to sustain them has in no wise shaken my confidence in their correctness; and I stand before you to-day, sir, to plead the cause of these resolutions. If I fail to convince the Senate that the resolutions are right, I shall not feel at all at least have the consolation of feeling that my hearers believe me to be sincere in offering them.

The resolution, and the bill which I subsequently introduced, and to which I have already alluded, embody these substantive principles: first, that the slave is not property in the Territories of the United States; secondly, that, being property, his owner has the same right to take him to a common Territory, and there hold him as property, that the owner of any other species of property has to take and hold it there; thirdly, that, having the constitutional right to take his property to the Territory, he is of necessity entitled to have it protected after he gets there, else the right would be nugatory. Up to this point, I have not found myself differing materially with my Democratic friends; but at this point, as you will said by my honorable friend from Indiana, [Mr. Fitch], we begin to diverge. I insist that it is primarily the duty of a Territorial Legislature to afford me the protection to which I am entitled; but the Legislature failing to refuse, then that it be the duty of the Congress to afford that protection; and here comes the rub. Is Congress, under any circumstances, bound to afford me adequate and sufficient protection for my slave property? I insist that it is; that if slaves are property under the Constitution, they are entitled to the same protection which is afforded to any other kind of property; and that, whatever obligations were imposed by the Constitution, are imposed directly upon Congress, and not upon a Territorial Legislature. Whatever appeal I, as a citizen of one of our sovereign States, may wish to address for the maintenance of my constitutional rights, I necessarily address to Congress; and why? Because all the powers imposed by the Federal Constitution to make laws were imposed upon Congress, and not, I repeat, upon a Territorial Legislature.

Sir, when the Constitution was formed, there was no such thing as a Territorial Legislature, and there was no such thing for many years afterwards. No authority is found in the debates which gave rise to the Constitution, indicating that the instrument of that instrument of that instrument ever would be such a legislative body as a Terri-

If I could find the exact property, I could bring my writ of replevin and recover it; but then, the same man who decoyed it from me yesterday might decoy it away to-morrow, and then I suppose I must bring another action of replevin; and so I must go on multiplying my actions to all eternity, recovering my property one day, simply to have it decoyed from my possession the next.

But suppose I cannot find the property, that it is as secreted I cannot get at it; John Brown's man, finding me in hot pursuit of my slave, secretes him. I prove that he had him in his possession, but I cannot find him. What then? I suppose I am told that then I am to bring an action of trover, or an action of trespass, or some other action sounding in damages, and that a friendly court and jury would assess me the full amount of my damages. So they might; but what will my judgment be worth if the offending party happens to be, as he would be nineteen times out of twenty, an insolvent? I should have a return of nuda bona, and be compelled myself to foot the bill of costs. I should have lost my property; been engaged in a litigious lawsuit; recovered a worthless verdict, and had to pay the costs. This is your common law. No, Mr. President, the experience of every State in this Union, for more than one hundred years, has demonstrated the proposition that slave property is not secure without statutory laws. The Constitution has been in existence for seventy years; the common law has been in existence here ever since the colonies adopted it; and never, at any time since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, has the Constitution aided only by the common-law remedies, afforded adequate and sufficient protection to slave property anywhere. The Senator goes on and says:

"Certainly [says the Senator] there is now no organized Territory adapted to slavery where it exists, or is likely to exist, and where protection is consequently required, and is withheld."

I differ very widely from my friend from Indiana. There is just such a Territory; it is the Territory of Kansas. There not only is protection withheld, but positive laws are passed prohibiting the existence of slavery. Does my friend from Indiana take the ground that Kansas is unsuited to slavery? I have heard this argument of climate and soil and production used so often against my appeal for the introduction of slavery into Kansas, that I stand prepared to answer it.

Sir, where is Kansas? It is in precisely the same latitude with the Capitol in which I speak to-day. The Capitol in which we are assembled for legislation to-day is not ten miles north or south of Wyandotte, the place where Kansas lately assembled in convention to form an anti-slavery constitution. Does slavery exist profitably here? Does it exist profitably all around us? Go into Maryland; go into Virginia; look into their planting interests, and come and tell me whether slavery does not exist in those States, in the same latitude with Kansas, with a greatly inferior soil, profitably, and whether it has not existed profitably for two hundred years; and yet we are told that it cannot exist profitably in Kansas on account of climate and soil and productions. The soil is the same, the climate is the same, the productions are the same. There are five States, one third of all the slaveholding States, lying in the same latitude with Kansas—Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee—each of which has a population of more than a million—States in which slavery has existed since the early settlement of this country, or from the earliest introduction of the black race on this continent; existed profitably at all times, and in all seasons, and in all climates, and in all soils, and cannot be introduced into Kansas, because the soil and climate and productions forbid it. Sir, I believe no such thing. If the master can work his slave profitably on the old lands in the States where he can work him on the virgin soil of Kansas, in the same latitude, worth $1.25 per acre? Ah, Sir, give him Maryland lands to protect his slaves from the weather, and give him the laws and regulations about climate, and soil and productions.

But what has been the course of this Territorial Legislature? Why should it commend itself, as it seems to do, not only to Republicans, but to Democrats? What are its appeals to your forbearance? It passed a law, which I have in the volume before me, which would have afforded the Territory an affording positive protection to slave property. Three years afterwards, as is shown by this volume, the Legislature repealed that law. The first Territorial Legislature of Kansas believed that slave property needed protection; and they afforded it by a positive law to the Legislature. When the second Legislature got the ascendency, they repealed that legislation, and substituted nothing in its place; thus practically carrying out the doctrines which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLASS] first predicted would be efficient for the exclusion of slavery from a Territory. He was right. When the Legislature took this course of inaction and unfriendly action on the part of a Territorial Legislature would be effective for the exclusion of slavery. That doctrine has been denounced and by none more vehemently than by the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. Fairs], and the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Schuyler]. But, I tell you, Mr. President, I will tell the country, that the doctrines promulgated by Senator from Illinois are in full force in Kansas to-day; and that they have produced the precise results which I predicted. I do not intend to announce these doctrines as I do; but when they are asked to apply the corrective, they pause, hesitate, and finally abruptly refuse.

Having repealed all laws in the Territory for the purpose of securing the equality of the white and colored races, the attitude of the Legislature then became one of non-action. The case up to that point stands as though Kansas had done nothing. In repealing her own statutes for the purpose of securing equality, she was friendly spirit; that was her friendly action. Thus by the non-action and unfriendly action, suggested, I say again, first by the Senator from Illinois, we have been excluded from Kansas. Second, we are now in a position to be expelled from it. I ask my Democratic friends who have been loud in the denunciation of that doctrine, as I have been, to interpose and restore these repealed laws for our protection, they would do it. Instead of doing so, however, they have been silent, and by, when very many other things have been shown, and they say that then they will be ready to interpose. Ah! my friends, you will interpose when all is lost. But more on that point presently.

My friend from Indiana tells me that whatever rights I have under the Constitution and the common law, he is for protecting—seeing them protected in the courts of justice; in other words, if he can go to the courts and obtain a judgment, based upon the common law and the Constitution, then he is for seeing the judgment executed. This is about the extent to which my honorable friend goes. I might almost ask the Senator from New York [Mr. SEAWAS] whether he would not go farther than that; whether he would not go so far as to actively take away from me a right guaranteed by the Constitution, and by the common law, as expounded by the Supreme Court? If I can establish a constitutional right, through the courts unaided by his active interference, I doubt very much, if the Senator were President, whether he would not see the judgment in my favor executed. It will not amaze the world much, then, if I say that my gratitude is not deeply excited by promises of this kind from a Democratic friend.

But, Mr. President, not only does this Government refuse that sort of protection to slave property in the Territories, which I think it is entitled to, but it has denied it protection everywhere. It totally ignores this species of property, though it constitutes the great moneyed interest of the country. There is directly and indirectly dependent upon the security of that property, investments of millions of the money of our country. Destroy our $2,000,000,000 worth of slaves and you destroy the value of the soil on which they work; you destroy the value of all our machinery; our stock becomes worthless; commerce is broken up; our cities dwindle and perish; and yet, sir, this great interest—the greatest individual interest under the Government—gets no protection from the Federal Government.

Wherever your property goes, on the land or upon the sea, Government stretches over it the strong arm of its power and protects it.

Sir, it was yesterday that I saw the stereotyped boast that the last night, or the night before, seventeen slaves had been spirited to Canada by the underground railroad. I saw the same old story show that thousands and thousands of slaves have been carried from the slaveholding States of this Union and secreted in Canada, and it is in the face of this explanation that I am to be told to suppose that the agents of the underground railroad were to boast every morning that last night they carried away seventeen head of horses from New York, one hundred head of horned cattle from Pennsylvania, and a hundred and fifty head of sheep from New Jersey. I suppose the underground railroad managers were constantly boasting that Canada was being made a receptacle for your stolen goods: what would the British Government say to that? Would it tell New York herself any? What would all the non-slaveholding States say? They would go to the President and demand that he discharge his duty, by notifying the British Government, that, unless the British Government would restore the stolen goods, it would be declared, and if its colony persisted in receiving and concealing the stolen goods of American citizens, this Government would resent the ing, even the Senate from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] whether he does not know that such would be the course of his section if northern property was taken instead of ours; yet he sees our property carried off, a million dollars' worth of it were taken from the hands of the Government, and he does not see it, and he does not care, and he goes on with a derisive laugh, and walks away. Are we not your equals in the Confederation? Have we not the same right to claim the protection of the Government for our property that you have for yours? I know not, sir, what other men would do, but I would have been very glad to have done so, until I had filed a notice with the British Minister accredited to this Government that, unless Canada yielded up the stolen negroes, as she would be compelled to yield up stolen horses, cattle, or any other property, she would be considered as interfering with the commerce of the United States, and if that remedy was not efficient, this Government would declare war. She has no more right to conceal my stolen negroes than she has to conceal your stolen goods; and I have the same reason to complain of her that you would have the same complaint good unheeded; yours would be listened to.

But, say gentlemen on our side, in your appeals for protection through the direct agency of Congress, you are departing from the recognized doctrine of the party—the doctrine of non-intervention. Sir, this argument so often repeated to, has been made in vain. It is an important principle to the public mind than all else that has been said on that subject. It has made its impression in the South, in the West, in the East, and in the North; and I will endeavor to answer it. I have the point very fairly stated in a private letter from a leading member of the House, and in retirement. His says: "I repeat, we will stand by and see you take possession and firmly plant slavery in all Territories adapted to slave labor, which will be evinced by the action of local legislatures."

else as it left us to the tender mercies of the Constitution, and the common law. It interpreted, by positive legislation, to protect every species of property except slave property.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator pardon me one moment? I do not wish to be misunderstood. I do not wish to place myself in the position of denying the present law, or of arguing that slave property with any other species of property in a Territory. When the Senator shows an actual case where the slaveholder has been wronged in any Territory of the United States by an action of a Territorial Legislature, and where he has no adequate remedy to redress that wrong, I, for one, shall be as ready to vote for the protection of slave property in a Territory as I would for the protection of any other species of property. I have no sympathy with those who deny that slaves are property, and justly and completely and as fully as any other species of property known to any law of any State of this Union; and I have no disposition to deny to that species of property any protection which any other species of property has afforded to it; but the difference between the Senator and myself is this: I think it supposes that there is a present actual necessity for such legislation; I have not seen that present necessity.

Mr. BROWN. I have already shown that Kansas passed laws in the beginning to protect this kind of property. I have shown you that repealed those laws and substituted nothing in their stead. I now go further, and show you that in derogation of the authority of Congress, and in violation of its laws, the people of that Territory have assembled through their delegates in convention, and made an anti-slavery constitution, thus acting the authority of Congress at defiance. I then show you that they have passed a law positively abolishing slavery in the Territory, thus setting the authority of the Supreme Court at defiance. I then go one step further, and show you that they have passed, with the law for a year, a personal liberty bill, more odious in its terms than even a similar bill passed by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts. I send the bill to the Secretary's desk, and ask him to read it.

The Secretary read, as follows:

An act to secure freedom to all persons within the Territory of Kansas.

Be it enacted by the Governor and Legislature, Annually of the Territory of Kansas: No person within this Territory shall be considered a slave, or be held to any form of purchase, or delivery; nor shall any person, within the limits of this Territory, at any time, be deprived of liberty or property without cause previously established.

Sec. 1. Use process of law, mentioned in the preceding section of this act, civil, in all cases, be defined to mean the usual process and forms in force by the laws of the Territory, and issued by the courts thereof; and under such process every person shall be entitled to a trial by jury.

Sec. 2. Whosoever any person in this Territory shall be deprived of liberty, arrested, or detained on the ground that such person owes service or labor to another person, who has made either written or without this Territory, either party may claim a trial by jury; and in such case, all the legal remedies and defenses provided by the law, in any case, shall be allowed the same as in any other case.

Sec. 3. Every person who shall deprive, or attempt to deprive, any other person of his liberty, contrary to the provisions of the preceding sections of this act, shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a fine not exceeding $100, nor less than he be held to any form of sale in the Territory, nor in a term not exceeding—

Sec. 4. Every person who shall hold, or attempt to hold, in this Territory, any person, or be held to any form of sale in any form, or for any time, however short, under a pretense that such person is or has been a slave, shall, on conviction thereof, be imprisoned in the State Prison, or county jail, for a term not less than one year, nor more than fifteen years, and be fined not exceeding $1,000.

Sec. 5. All acts and laws heretofore passed in violation of the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

Sec. 6. This act shall take effect from its passage.

Mr. BROWN. Thus we see, Mr. President, that the Territorial Legislature of Kansas deprives us of our rights by non-action, and by positive legislation; goes on and adopts a constitution in violation of the authority of Congress; passes a law in derogation of a decision of the Supreme Court positively prohibiting slavery; and then winds up the whole affair with that personal liberty bill; and still we are asked to fold our arms and let the Territory, the Constitution and the common law to give us protection. Sir, the gentlemen who have so much faith in courts, unaided by statutory laws, go far ahead of the teachings of my experience. Why, sir, I should as soon think of proceeding against Mr. Brown, to get him out of the Territory, as I should Harper's Ferry by an action of ejectment, relying on the court to give me a judgment of ouster, and then sending the sheriff with his posse to turn him out, as to rely on the courts, aided only by the Constitution and the common law, to give me protection for my rights against such legislation as this.

What I demand is protection—that protection which you admit we are entitled to by the common Constitution. Give it to us now; do it at once. You see what delays have produced. You see of what right, of what liberty, of what privileges, we have been deprived by your non-action heretofore. Still you are content to wait. We have no Territory after Territory beyond redemption, and all for what? Not because the soil and climate and production were against us, but because we had no law to protect us. We waited under these specious pleas that our rights would be snatched from us until they were gone without hope of recovery. We come again and ask protection, and you tell us still to wait.

Sir, I had published in the gazettes of the day a series of resolutions, said, I have no reason to doubt, correctly, to have been agreed upon in a convention held in the Territory, and which were, second, and third, and to the sixth and seventh of those resolutions, I make no objection, and therefore shall offer no comment. The fourth and fifth do not so precisely meet my approbation. The fourth resolve is in these words:

Resolved, That neither Congress nor a Territorial Legislature, whether direct legislation, or by an indirect and indirectly character, possess power to annul or to impair the constitutional right of any citizen of the United States to take his slave property into the common Territories and there hold and enjoy the same while the territorial condition remains.

I have only a verbal criticism to make on that resolution. I like the word "right" better than that word "power." I can say with confidence that a Territorial Legislature may have the power to accomplish the result without doing it rightfully. I have seen that result accomplished already: accomplished wrongfully; still it was the exercise of power. I have no expectation, no belief, that they will be contented with any other result, and I have seen purpose that I would have, if I substituted a different word; and therefore I criticize the introduction of it here in an unfriendly spirit. I suppose it was intended to be used as synonymous with the word "right." With that alteration that resolution I should be satisfied. The fifth resolution is in these words:

Resolved, That if experience should at any time prove that the judicial and executive authority do not possess means to insure adequate protection to constitutional rights of citizens, and if the Territorial government shall refuse or refuse to provide the necessary remedies for that purpose, it will be the duty of Congress to supply such deficiency.

Sir, I think the duty of Congress commences at an earlier period than is designated in this resolution. I am not willing to wait for experience to demonstrate that which experience has already demonstrated. So far as any individual is concerned, I have no objection to the resolution that experience has proved in the last twenty years all that experience will prove for seventy years to come. Sir, if experience has not already shown us that protection, by direct and immediate legislation, is necessary for the security of our rights in the Territory, I have no objection that it never will demonstrate that fact. I have said before, and now repeat, in this connection, that experience in every one of the slaveholding States has shown that legislation is necessary in aiding the executive and judiciary to give protection to this kind of property. Such legislation has been found necessary in Mississippi, necessary in Louisiana, necessary in all the slaveholding States without a solitary exception, so far as I am informed or believe. If experience has shown that protection is necessary in all the slave States, why are we called upon to wait until experience shall demonstrate that a like necessity exists in a Territory? I see no reason for it. I think experience has shown us that, unaided by statutory law, slavery has not been protected in any Territory, and that it has been driven out by the force of public opinion in derogation of the rights of the master, and, as I honestly believe, in total disregard of the guarantees of the Constitution.

And if the territorial government shall fail or refuse to provide the necessary remedy—

Why, sir, have they not already failed and refused? Have I not read documents, as procured from Kansas, showing that they have failed and refused? Why wait? If you are going to legislate actively, when it shall be shown that they have failed and refused, then you must do it now. They have failed; they have refused; they have refused to pass any law, they have refused to pass any liberty bill; bills abolishing slavery; bills repealing former laws protecting slavery. If all this does not prove that Kansas has failed and refused, I do not know what evidence we shall require to prove that they have failed and refused.

Only, Mr. President, with a view to indicate my own clear convictions on this subject, and with no expectation that the proposition is to be received with greater favor in the Senate than it is received elsewhere, I give notice that when this resolution is brought to a vote of the Senate, I shall move this amendment:

That experience having already shown that the Constitution and the common law, unaided by statutory enactment, do not afford adequate and sufficient protection to slave property, some of the Territories having failed, others having refused, to pass such enactments, it has become the duty of Congress to interpret and pass such laws as will afford adequate and sufficient protection to the rights of citizens to take their slave property into the Territories, which is given to other kinds of property.

I say that it is my purpose to propose this amendment. I shall vote for it myself. If it fails, then I shall vote against it. I have no standard, and I have no chief, because of the concluding words, "and these things shall have happened, when we get the necessary experience, and when the Territorial Legislature shall have been shown to fail and refuse, then the resolution says 'it will be the duty of Congress to supply such remedy.'" In that, I get a recognition of the principle for which I contend, that it is your duty to act. You refuse to act now. That is the gravamen of my complaint. You want a greater amount of evidence to bring your minds to the conclusion that I require. I have no objection to that, but I have both the contingencies on which you base your determination to act, to pass laws for the protection of slave property, have already happened. I do not feel, myself, that any further experience is necessary or demonstrative that the courts, unaided by statute, are unable to afford protection. I think we have abundant evidence that the Territories, some of them, at least, have failed and refused to afford this protection; and, no thinking, I am prepared to act now. If my friends will not be convinced, I will not be. I will not be. I will then stand quietly, and wait until their minds are brought to the same conclusion as my own. I hope, if we are ever to have protection, we shall get it while it may be useful, and not have it mockingly tendered after the Territories are hopelessly lost to the South and to slavery.

Talking about protection is a very idle ceremony. If we present a case demanding protection, you ought to meet it like men. If we have no case, say so, and let us quit talking about it. Promises about what Congress will do years hence, when we shall see the result, are not worth the paper on which they are recorded.

Apologizing, Mr. President, for having detained the Senate so long, I yield the floor.

Mr. FITCH. Mr. President, some of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi call for a brief response from me. I have no objection to the Senate for a very short time, aware, as I am, from the lateness of the hour, that members must be extremely anxious to leave the Chamber. The Senator spoke in complimentary terms of the approved efficacy of my professional, my medical prescriptions, but appears averse to having my political prescriptions—deems them inert. I trust it will be many years before the Senator requires a prescription for the benefit of his bodily health. May he live a thousand years without a single bodily ailment. But that he is a slaveholder, I call; and yet he will not perceive the disease, or, perceiving it, will not admit its existence. He is like the victim of that scourge of our race in variable climates, the consumption; the victim who, after passing away under the ravages of the disease, finds it is a slaveholder, and that it is, and fancies that his friends, whose solicitude in his behalf calls them daily about him, are laboring under some strange hallucination relative to his condition. Possibly I could convince the Senator that he is a slaveholder, and that he is, to become the victim, of a dangerous political malady. Pos-ably I could point out the appropriate treatment for its recovery. Possibly I could prepare a political prescription for his benefit, possessed of curative powers equal to those he has been pleased to assign to my professional. But I much fear me, as he has indicated that he would not adopt my treatment, that he would not take my prescription. I must, therefore, be content to sit, and those acting with me and our remedies, to paralyze an eminent northwestern man, deemed, by many, a political empire, and his nostrums; for while the Senator will not himself, as he has assured us, take that empiric's nostrums, deceptions, and economies, yet «contentless» remedies to their effects upon others, and pursue such course toward his nostrums as may well induce others to take them.

His argument, designed to prove that the common law cannot protect slave property, is an argument against the truth of history. African slavery was first introduced into England and its possessions under the common law. It first came to this country under the common law. It received here, and throughout the English dependencies, its full protection from the common law—years during which it most flourish; years during which it acquired that vigor which has perpetuated itself to this time. That law, as the Senator will said, exists not only in this country, but wherever the Anglo-Saxon race has established a government, except in the particular instances in which it has been superseded by particular legislative acts. It exists certainly in this country, not only in States, but in Territories alike. In both alike it is recognized by the courts, except where it comes in conflict with some constitutional legislative enactment. Well, sir, one of its first axioms is, that every right has its remedy. I would say, then, to the Senator from Mississippi, he has but to establish his right, and the remedy necessarily goes with it. The Constitution has asserted the right, and we must conquer with that of the North in the Territories. The Supreme Court has affirmed this right. The Constitution, the courts, and the common law, will protect the right. A Territorial Legislature may regulate as to improve that protection. If it does not do so, it is not the Legislature, but the action recently inculcated, and evades its duty; but it cannot go any further in that direction; it cannot violate its duty and the Constitution by destroying, or even impairing the right; however, it may make the situation, a mockery of the right. I think it reasons thus: if a Territorial Legislature has the right to protect and to regulate the protection of slave property, it has the right to impair its value; if it has the right to impair its value, it has the right to destroy it. What abhorrent reasoning, if it can be called reasoning! My friend from Mississippi dissents from the rationale, but arrives at its conclusion.

The Constitution guarantees to every citizen life, liberty, and his property. The Constitution, the courts, and the common law, protect these rights. A Legislature may regulate, but it cannot prove this protection. A Legislature may, for instance, vary the punishment for a violation of these rights. It may vary the punishment for taking life; but does the power to vary the punishment for taking life carry with it the power, by indirect action, to lessen the value of the life of the innocent citizen? the power to place his life in daily jeopardy? the power to destroy his life? The latter proposition might as well be maintained as a similar one relative to the power to appropriate property.

I shall allude to but one time—will not allow more—of the Senator's illustrations in support of his opinion that the common law is impotent to the protection of slave property. He asks, «If a man decoys my slave from one country to another, what remedy has he? He will be permitted that he had a remedy, but objected that the remedy must necessarily be applied day after day.» We can look at this illustration made by him, in the very same light with another illustration which I have heard, if I mistake not, from the same Senator. A man creates a law to sell the two. It has been objected to the common law that it contained no provision against, and provided no punishment for selling liquor to slaves; and that in the absence of such law, their owners might find them, at times, not only useless and troublesome, but mischievous. The difficulty in both cases, in the illustration of to-day and the previous one, is not in punishing the act, but it is in creating it. Laws exist, I presume, in every slaveholding State, prohibiting and punishing the sale of spirits to slaves, prohibiting and punishing the decoying away of a negro. If a negro, when he is owned as property, is found in the possession without permission of law or owner of any other person, the possession implies the fact that such person has decoyed him away, and in proof sufficient; but if he is found running at large, no one is responsible for his being so, unless the fact can be carried home to some individual who has decoyed him away. The remedy is to be established? Or if a slave is found intoxicated, and thus useless, how are you to prove that any white man sold him spirits in violation of law? You cannot do it under the existing laws. The slaveholding States, and several of the non-slaveholding, prohibit the negro testimony being received against a white man. What then is the Senator's remedy, if he has it not under the common law? Would he come here and ask Congress to do that which his own Legislature has refused to do—that the negro owe the level with the white man? the courts, put him on an equality with the Senator himself before a court? Surely he would not ask that kind of congressional legislation; and if he did, respect for ourselves, if not for the Government of which we are a part, would compel us to deny it.

He points us to the action of the Legislatures of Nebraska and Kansas, in proof of the necessity of congressional intervention, and in justification of the intervention he asks in his resolutions and bill. What is that action? The Legislature of Nebraska passed a law prohibiting slavery. The Governor vetoed it, and the veto was sustained. Surely, on this abortive attempt at usurpation of power, the Senator cannot base an application for protection of slave property in Nebraska, even if property of that kind existed there for protection, as he has based it on Kansas. The Legislature of Kansas passed a similar act, and that, too, was vetoed, but passed again over the veto. The Senator, in commenting on the resolutions last introduced by his colleague, stated that the remedies for protecting property, now proposed by the Legislature, as Congress must afford, were exhausted, and therefore Congress must intervene. Not so, even in Kansas. The judiciary yet stands between the right sought to be destroyed by the Kansas Legislature, and the usurpation by the Legislature of that right is sought. What would you who have the decision of that judiciary will be? No one who has read the Dred Scott decision can for a moment doubt that the courts, upon appeal, will declare the recent attempt at usurpation in Kansas, by a prohibitory act, null and void, and leave the owners of slave property there in the possession of their common-law remedies for protection—remedies which, in my estimation, will be found quite sufficient. This action to which he has pointed was the first, but the legitimate fruit of the right asserted by the Senator in his resolutions, (Mr. DOUGLASS) and it was honestly introduced in part, doubtless, from a supposition upon the part of the Territorial Legislature that the overshadowing influence of that Senator would induce a congressional sanction of their usurpation. When this supposition was disappointed, and the Senator and when those Legislatures have been rebuked by the courts for their attempted usurpation, as we know in advance, from the Dred Scott decision, they will be, such action will not be repeated. It will be no other remedy, but the Legislature, and the doctrine on which it is based will cease to be entertained; unless, indeed, the Senator from Mississippi and others who may be disposed to aid him secure the nomination for the Presidency of the main pillar of the doctrine, and thus make it a settled government principle.

The absence of any special legislative protection for slave property may, I grant you, subject the owners of that property to inconveniences, to annoyances; but certainly to none greater than are the owners of other self-moving, locomotive property daily subjected to—inconveniences and annoyances requiring vigilance for the preservation of property, but not affecting its title, nor necessarily its possession. We must not create, and we should not be asked to create—and I doubt our right to grant the request if it is asked—rigidly either for the North or for the South, by legislation; but it is our duty, the duty of every department of the Government, to see that rights granted by, or recognized by, the Constitution, receive adequate protection. The power of the judiciary to grant such protection cannot be questioned; because the judiciary derives its power from the Constitution, which asserts the right; and the judiciary was created by the Constitution for the very purpose of asserting and defending rights under it. Hitherto, the courts have been found possessed of the required means for the adequate exercise of that power. If, at any time hereafter, they are found deficient in those means, and the Legislature neglects to supply the deficiency, it is the duty of Congress to supply the deficiency in support of the courts; but it is not the duty, and scarce the right, of Congress, to grant that general legislation in advance contemplated by the Senator's resolutions, and asked by his bill. Such legislation would be a departure, as he has well said, from that great principle of non-intervention we have so long sustained—a principle now so necessary, as it has been heretofore, for our success; and not only for that, but so necessary to harmonize between the northern and southern wings of the only party who has its members from Lakes to the Gulf.

As with the Senator's special «decoy» argument adverse to the common law, so with his others; their fallacy generally can be shown; and the justice of the intervention he asks for both of most of the congressional legislation he asks for the Territories, can be easily demonstrated; but I do not design to consume the time of the Senate with any lengthy arguments on the subject. I shall leave them to able heads. Far better leave the protection of an established right to both of the Constitution, the courts, and the great unwritten common law, which is the sense of right among intelligent men, their common sense and that of the courts, than to that over-legislation asked for in the Senator's bill, which would subject him to more inconvenience, more annoyance, in subversion of its provisions, than will the absence of all legislation.

Mr. President, I have already, however, gone further than it was my intention to do on first rising. Now, I have a few words to say on a subject which I design making a motion. There lies upon the desk a communication from the regents of the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association, extending the courtesy of an invitation to the Senate, or such members of it as may choose to accept of it, to visit Mount Vernon, and to-morrow in Washington to-morrow. A boat, it appears, is placed at the disposal of the association, or such members of it as happen to be now in the city, who propose to visit Mount Vernon for the first time since they have completed its purchase. They would be doubtless gratified at the acceptance of the invitation; and for the purpose of allowing Senators who may design to accept of it to do so without interfering with public duties, I move that when we adjourn, we adjourn to meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow, and to-morrow we adjourn at three o'clock.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BUELER in the chair.) The Senator of course must first move the postponement of the subject under consideration.

Mr. FITCH. I move, then, the temporary postponement of it, unless some gentleman wishes to speak now.

Mr. GWIN. I want to call up the West Point appropriation bill.

Mr. FITCH. Will the Senator permit me to make any motion?

Mr. GWIN. Certainly, provided I can make the motion to call up that bill.

Mr. FITCH. I move the postponement of this subject.

The motion was agreed to.

BOOK OF MEETING.

Mr. FITCH. Now I move that when we adjourn this afternoon, we adjourn to meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow, and then adjourn at three p. m. to-morrow.

Mr. WIGFALL. I hope the vote will not be taken on that yet. It may be important to consume the time in business. If the Senator will withdraw that motion, I will renew it at some other time.

Mr. MASON. Will Senators allow me to suggest this; let us meet to-morrow at twelve, if they desire it—

Mr. FITCH. Very well. I will withdraw the latter part of the motion.

Mr. MASON. And let Senators who desire to go on this excursion, go; but do not make it matter of formal entry that we adjourn to go with the ladies to Mount Vernon or anywhere else.

Mr. FITCH. I do not know that we could have better company.

Mr. GWIN. The motion, I understand, is to meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to amend that by saying twelve o'clock to-morrow, and each day thereafter.

Mr. DAVIS. There is a great deal of committee work to be done. I am serving on four committees. I do not know whether others are quite so inconveniently circumstanced as I am; but I find the hour from twelve to one more profitably employed in the committee rooms than I believe it to be in the Senate; and I think we had better continue to meet at one o'clock, at least until we get all the business out of the committee rooms and before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BRIGHT. I must confirm what has been so well said by my friend from Mississippi. I hope we shall not change the hour.

Mr. FITCH. My proposition only embraces one day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On that subject, it seems to me that, at this stage of the session, ought to meet as early as twelve o'clock in the day. When it gets to be about four o'clock, there is a very great uneasiness, and gentlemen begin to leave the Senate one after another. If we meet at an earlier hour, I think we shall accomplish more business in the Senate; and although I know that the committees are busy, still the committees can meet at the hour of ten o'clock, instead of meeting at the hour of eleven.

Mr. HALE. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. For one, I confess that my opinion coincides with that of the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Indiana. I think we can do a great deal better by meeting at one o'clock than at twelve. I have found it so. I beg my friends on this side of the House, when they see so much good sense on the other, not to go and act like fools. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment. ["Oh, no!"]

Mr. WIGFALL. I hope the Senator will withdraw that. We have something to do.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask for the yeas and nays. I wish to take the sense of the Senate on this question.

The yeas and nays were not ordered. The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the original motion of the Senator from Indiana, that the Senate meet to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. HAYES, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had at twelve o'clock this day ordered the printing of the following documents:

Letter of the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting statement showing the pay and allowances to the officers of the Navy and marine corps, for the year ending June 30, 1859;

Letter of the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting copies of the Navy Register for the current year.

Also, that the House had passed the following bills and resolution, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

An act (No. 19) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, for the better protection of female passengers, and for other purposes.

An act (No. 279) providing for satisfying claims for bounty lands, and for other purposes.

A joint resolution (No. 11) providing for the manner of expending the balance of appropriate tion for repairing the works and piers, in order to preserve and secure the light-house at Chicago, Illinois.

Also that the House had passed Senate bill (No. 217) for the relief of William B. Herrick.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. GWIN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the West Point Academy. I hope it will be taken up.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would inquire if it is the intention of the Senator, in calling up that bill, that we shall proceed to the discussion of the matter to-night?

Mr. GWIN. My own desire is, to leave it as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is proposed merely to call it up and leave it the unfinished business for to-morrow. I have no objection.

Mr. WIGFALL. I want it proceeded with to-night. I desire to have it disposed of.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I object to taking it up, because it is manifestly improper to call up at this hour of the afternoon, for the purpose of introducing a bill of no great importance, and so much debate, after what so many gentlemen have left the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Allow me for one moment to make a suggestion to the Senator from Maine. I have had no conference about this matter with the Senator from Texas, but I am very certain that if the Senator from Maine, who makes this objection, would listen to the details, horrible in their character, from the frontier of Texas, he would not hesitate for one moment to consider the bill and either pass it or reject it, so as to let that people know what to expect and what to do. I have listened to these details from a source in which I have confidence. I have heard them from a gentleman with whom I have been intimate, and whom I have known well, who was formerly an officer of the United States Army, and who resigned his position and settled in Texas—a man of the highest character. What he has told me shows the condition of things on that frontier to be not only lamentable but horrible.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And to this moment, notwithstanding the debate the other day, we do not get a communication on the subject from the Executive—not a particle of information.

Mr. MASON. The Senator is mistaken. It is on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON. When did it come?

Mr. MASON. It came to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If the Senator from Maine will allow me further, I will state that the position in which the Executive stands was depicted the other day at considerable length, and all the tenets that the Senator could put to the Administration were then applied. I certainly put the matter before the Senate, and I am now taken up by me put them more forcibly to-day than he did then. If that be so, the question must address itself to him whether he will take any step to grant relief unless the President of the United States can be by him forced to do so before the Senate was taken into consideration on the subject. These people are in relief, and I think we ought, at least, to consider their case and pass upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President—

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senators from Maine and Arkansas will allow me, I will merely state that since the time this subject was laid before the Senate, a communication has been made by the Secretary of War upon it, which is in the room of the Committee on Military Affairs now, and can be sent for. It was in answer to a bill which was sent by the Committee on Military Affairs some time ago to the War Department, and bears on the matter under consideration, on which the two Senators are discussing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I understand the communication has been sent for to the committee room, and I presume no Senator will object to the reading of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BELLA.) The communication is before the Chair.

Mr. WADE. I had the floor for to-morrow on the resolution that has been under consideration to-day. I consented that it might be taken up to-day to accommodate the Senator from Mississippi; but I was understood, I believe, all around, that I should have the floor to-morrow morning.

Mr. WIGFALL. I so understood it.

Mr. WADE. If it was so understood, unless there is some business that is very pressing, I should like to have the floor to-morrow morning.

Mr. GWIN. In that condition of things, I appeal to the Senator from Maine to let us take up this appropriation bill which is also pressing, on account of the situation of affairs in Texas, and let the Senator from Ohio have the floor to-morrow, as he is evidently prepared to speak, and it is inconvenient to a Senator, under such circumstances to postpone him. I am willing to present this question in the most favorable form. We have now the communication from the War Department that the Senator from Maine, as well as myself, has been waiting for. I hope we shall take it up. We have now time, I think, to act on this bill.

Mr. MASON. I would suggest that the Senate is very full, that it is two hours at least, if not more, of the sun sets, and that is an important matter, as shown by the papers on the table, as well as by the very proper urgency of the Senator from Texas. I hope the bill will be taken up, and at any rate, a vote reached on the proposition of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I commenced my address to the Chair, I was not aware that there was anything at all on the table upon the subject. I had not heard that there was any communication from the President or Secretary of War; I knew nothing about it. That I objected to was that the bill should be called up at this hour of the day, as we were about adjourning, without any previous notice, when many Senators had left the Chamber, for the purpose of going on with it, and taking a vote upon it. It had a very unfair appearance, and so much so, that I, an individual, took the other day, that, in the shape in which the measure then presented itself, the Senators on this side of the Chamber were opposed to it decidedly; and it looked very strange to me that at half past four o'clock in the afternoon a matter which had been so much debated on this side, and gone on the table by common consent to await communications from the Executive, and to await a report from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which it had been referred, should be called up in this way.

The Senators say that we have all the information from the Executive which was sought for, and an Executive recommendation on the subject, I, of course, shall not object to the bill being taken up; but I will say to Senators that I think the fairer course would be, under such circumstances, when the Senate is divided upon a question of this kind, and is well known and understood to be so divided, to give notice in the morning that you intend to call up the bill in half past four or five o'clock in the afternoon, and that you mean to call it up for action.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have the notice this morning.

Mr. GWIN. I did; and I knew that these papers were here when I gave the notice.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My understanding—and it was certainly so regarded on this side of the Chamber—was, that the only motive which the Senator from California had in calling up the bill this morning, was to do what he said was to right a wrong that had been done the other day, and that we had simply to restore the bill to the table.

Mr. GWIN. I am sorry to be misunderstood in consideration. I proposed to put it in such a condition then, that we could call it up this evening.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator says he gave the notice. Certainly I did not hear it.

Mr. GWIN. Certainly I did give it, because the papers were here, and I knew that we could consider them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The papers have not been printed.

Mr. GWIN. They are in the hands of the chairmen of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then you are going to act contrary to all custom; because, when communications of this kind are made from the Executive, they are always printed, so that the Senate may see what they are.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will allow me, I think I can explain this matter so that it may be understood. There seems to be some confusion in the Senate as to the matter, and I want to put the matter straight. A bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which bill was sent to the War Office for information and the views of the Secretary. The Secretary replied yesterday. The committee on Military Affairs have not had a meeting since this reply was received. Therefore, of course, I have not reported it back to the Senate, nor does it appertain to the amendment to this bill, otherwise than as it belongs to the same subject. His reply was upon a bill which was before the Committee on Military Affairs, and I expect to get the action of the committee on it tomorrow. If this subject is called up for consideration, the information called for can be laid before the Senate and digested as they think proper.

Mr. BAYARD. The motion made by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Browne], this morning, which the Senate acted upon, was to postpone, for an hour and a half, the bill which was then the special order—the bill to amend the act in relation to the Court of Claims. With what I see of the tone and temper of the Senate, I am not desirous, though that is a practical, and not a political question, to press it upon them now; but I ask the Senate to allow me to take it up, and as there is no special order for Monday next, to move to postpone it and make it the special order for Monday next, at half past one o'clock. Then gentlemen can dispose of these other matters during the interim.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a question under consideration, which must first be disposed of.

Mr. COMBES. I hope the appropriation bill will not be taken up. I think the Senator from Maine is quite right. We have referred this question to the Military Committee.

Mr. WIGFALL. Will the Senator allow me to make a word of explanation?

Mr. COMBES. Yes.

Mr. WIGFALL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for the opportunity that he has given me. Immediately after the beginning of this session, as soon as Congress met, my colleague—I not being here then—introduced a bill providing for an appropriation for a regiment of Texas rangers that was already authorized by law. The chairman of the Military Committee, to which that bill was referred, wrote immediately thereafter to the War Department and received no answer until yesterday. The object of his communication was such as is usual in such cases, to obtain the necessary information and details as to the amount of the appropriation. Finding that the Secretary of War did not send any answer to the Military Committee, I, knowing the state of things in Texas, introduced a resolution requesting the President to muster the regiment into the field and trust to luck and to the sense of justice and the patriotism of the two Houses to make the appropriation afterwards. I consulted with all the different Departments, but I could get no action on the part of any of them. In the meantime there was a war going on upon our northern frontier with the Indians and upon our western border with the Mexicans.

I found that the resolution which I introduced was not useful—one side of this Chamber being opposed to it on general principles, and the other side supposing that it might involve some imputation on the Administration. Time passed on, and then I introduced an amendment to the West Point appropriation bill. I did that because I thought if I introduced a bill which it would meet the same fate that the bill which my colleague introduced had met—it would be referred to a committee. An appropriation bill moved, as for the West Point Academy. I then moved, as an amendment to that, making an appropriation for this regiment that was already provided for by law. Last Wednesday or Thursday that question came up. We took a test vote on it. The Senator from Maine says it was obvious that his side of the Chamber was opposed to it. There were at least three Senators on that side who declared that they would vote for it. It was attempted, in order to get his side, by a motion to refer it to a committee. We took a test vote upon that motion. There were 31 votes in favor of the measure and against the reference, and 25 on the other side. Just at that time, however, by some parliamentary gentleman who I do not understand, while I was filibustering about, and declaiming for my bill, and trying to get votes for it, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SALLISBURY] had the bill referred to a committee; and "Presto change!" before I could turn around and see what was done, the Senate had it again from the committee and upon the table. [Laughter.]

Under these circumstances, I waited to see what would turn up next. Then Senators wanted some information from the War Department. We now have the information from the War Department. Yesterday morning I came here and desired to call up the bill, but I was told not to press it. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] said that they had one or two judiciary bills which they would get through in a short time, and as soon as they were through with, he would send them in to me, in order to get his side, I forbore to press it. This morning the Senator from Mississippi wanted to speak. Well, I was willing to let him do that. The speech has been delivered; the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary is waiting to postpone the regular order, and we are to take this up; and now it is objected to and from the State of Georgia comes the objection.

I will say to the Senator from Georgia that I received this morning a newspaper from Texas, published on the 25th day of last month, only ten days ago, in which we have the following, together received, that in three of the center counties of the State the Indians have simultaneously made an attack, one of them a county within fifty or one hundred miles of the seat of government. There are four counties now involved. Some eight or ten different parties of Indians have attacked the settlements in four different counties, and three of those lying almost adjoining the county in which the seat of government is situated. Five persons were killed in Bosque, one of those counties, and two persons in Corsell, in Lampasas they do not know what destruction of life and of property has taken place. In Palo Pinto some four or five families had been attacked. There were men there present who drove the Indians off; but they at last attacked a house inhabited by four women, in which there were one man and those four women were captured. Their neighbors immediately followed upon the Indian trail, and they found two of them with unmistakable evidence upon their persons of having been abused in the most brutal manner, and scalped. Since that time the other two have been unable to return home, without a vestige of clothing upon them—the habit of the Comanches being to turn loose those whom they have abused, if they do not kill them.

Under these circumstances, with a war raging not upon our northern frontier, but carried down to the very seat of government, with a war upon the Rio Grande going on now, I ask, am I impatient, having waited for nearly two months here to get some legislative action on the subject? Senators have objected, because they do not want them, in substance, to say they wanted the Administration to make a recommendation. The Administration is now making it. The Secretary of War has informed the chairman of the Military Committee that he deems this appropriation necessary, that he thinks it should be made, and he has always thought so. He is anxious to muster this regiment into service, and would so if this appropriation be made. Now we have his letter here; the Administration is committed to and advises the course I propose to pursue, and I ask, why longer delay?

I am told that it is now half past four o'clock. Suppose it is. I have heard that in England, not during the better days of the Republic, prisoners were sometimes hanged that judges might die; but I trust in God that in this country an American Senator will not adjourn for dinner while the people in one of the States of the Union are suffering from the tomahawk and the scalping-knife. I do not expect Senators on the side of the Chamber on which the Senator from Maine sits, to vote against this. They may have peculiarities, they may have notions, they may have sympathies for a claim of the human family that extend those to some matters, but I do not believe they have entirely lost all sympathy with their own color. Those women who are murdered and outraged are white women, and the State in which those things are taking place is one of the States of this Union. She has given up her army and her navy. She has entered into a compact with the other States, and the other States have agreed, through this Federal Government, to protect her people; but they have been left exposed to the tomahawk and the scalping-knife ever since they have been admitted into the Union. I may just as well tell the whole story; it is not a long one, and I shall not take up much time.

This Indian war has been going on in Texas ever since our country was upon the upper Wichita and the Red river, and the Canadian, the buffalo assemblage in summer; and with the buffalo the Comanches and other wild tribes assemble to feed on them. As the winter comes on, the buffalo moves south for grass, and the Indian comes down. When they approach the settlements they enter; and then they pass upon our western border, down between the settlements and the Staked plain, cross the Rio Grande, go into Mexico, rob and commit depredations in Mexico until spring; when they return by the same route, go north with the buffalo, and there they congregate together in large villages. It is in the fall, when they have followed the buffalo down to the northern border of Texas, and when they are passing down on our western frontier to Mexico, that they break up into small parties and attack and sack settlements along the northern border, sometimes making incursions into the State to the distance of a hundred, two hundred, and two hundred and fifty miles, in small parties through thinly settled portions, avoiding those settlements that are thick. When they come back into Mexico, they again make depredations; and there is but one way that these people can be reached, and that is in summer, when they have congregated together upon the Canadian, upon the Red river, and upon the Wichita, to attack them in their towns, and there punish them for their depredations.

This is the advice given in the correspondence of General Twiggs, who has been the commander of that department for years past, which was published by order of the Senate last year. He says that there is but one way of dealing with the Comanches, and that is to attack them in their settlements during the summer months. Major Van Dorn, in 1848, went into that country and attacked them near the Wichita or Canadian and defeated them. Unfortunately, Major Van Dorn was superseded, and when he was superseded his company was removed and he went upon leave of absence. He has returned to the country. Now, there are not troops enough in Texas for these expeditions. The spring has broken upon us. The time for the summer campaign has passed. The Secretary of War is desirous to send all the troops he can down to Texas, but there are no troops to send. The regiments now in Utah will not be in that country before fall, when it will be too late either to operate on the Rio Grande or against these Indians. But with such regiments as the Secretary of War has in Texas, a campaign can be made against the Indians this summer, and they can be bound to keep the peace by the punishment which will be inflicted upon them. In the meantime, the troops that are in Texas, aided by ten companies of soldiers, the soldiers of the Rio Grande, and that border can be protected.

A State that has a war going on from its center to its circumference, upon its northern frontier, coastguard such a force on the border as the means and men at the command of the Department could authorize.

It is certain that, whatever may have been the origin of the quarrel, or who the parties to it at first, it has now grown to a formidable and dangerous proportion. The band of Cortinas increased rapidly, until its numbers reached over five hundred men, and he moved himself and his followers to the Grande, there keeping up a constant and friendly intercourse with the Mexican border, and maintaining an attitude of determination to resist any attempt to dislodge him. He remained until the 30th of December, when Major Heston, with one hundred and fifty regular troops, and one hundred and eighty Texas volunteers, led by Major Heston, strongly posted, and, after a sharp engagement, routed him completely, taking his guns, camp equipment, and mule-trains, and killing about sixty of his men. Cortinas fled with his shattered band to the Mexican shore, where he still remains, insulting and firing upon American vessels, and thus defying the authority of the United States to exercise any, which is greatly questioned by many intelligent persons, and giving opportunity to the United States to arrest parties of his men cross the river constantly for the purposes of theft and plunder.

This state of affairs, as I understand it, constitutes the foundation of the report of the commissioners sent by the Governor of Texas to the frontier to examine into all the facts connected with the disturbances on the border. And upon their report, he declares that Texas has been invaded, and he calls for the "interposition of the Federal arm" for the protection of the citizens of the State.

This call of the Governor is the first which has yet been made by the authorities of Texas for Federal troops to be sent to the border. It is a call for Federal troops to be sent to the border, and it is a call for Federal troops to be sent to the border, and it is a call for Federal troops to be sent to the border.

But upon this call of the Governor of Texas, and upon the undeniable proof of gross and flagrant wrongs, which I did not hesitate to urge a concentration of all the force upon the frontier which the exigencies of the service elsewhere would allow.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. M. FLOYD, Secretary of War.

TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I gave way to hear these communications read; and I have a remark or two to make upon them. The Senator will not fail to observe one or two things in them. The President simply said to Governor Johnson's communication to the Senate. He makes no recommendation at all; and, if I am not mistaken, the Governor says nothing in his communication about the Indians.

Mr. WIGFALL. He does, distinctly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If he does, I do not hear it, and those listening with me did not hear it.

Mr. WIGFALL. Read it again.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear that again, if I am mistaken.

The Secretary read as follows:

"I deplore the situation of Texas. An empty treasury, the Indian troubles, unquenched for the last ten years, and the forces from Mexico to the frontier, have all been calculated to impress the mind of the Executive of the State of Texas with the intricacies of the attitude which he has, in justice to his fellow citizens and humanity, to assume, should not the Federal arm be speedily raised and extended in behalf of our suffering frontier."

Mr. FESSENDEN. What for? That Indian troubles on the border for the last ten years should call for the speedy interposition of the Executive arm?

Mr. WIGFALL. That they are greater than they have been for the last ten years.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We heard that over and over again in the Senate, while the Senator now the Governor of Texas was here, at least some four or five times during every session of Congress, and Congress passed upon that. What I want to say was, that he said nothing of any right in saying was, that he does not intimate that there are any particularly recent Indian troubles calling for the interposition of the Federal Government, nothing of modern date. He goes back to what he urged on the Senate heretofore, and what was urged on the Senate when we authorized this regiment to be raised, if the President thought it best to call it into the field and to organize it. Therefore I was right substantially, in the assertion I made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. His communication is directed particularly to the matter of Cortinas and his band. Then, when we come to the communication of the Secretary of War, what is that? It proves conclusively that the greater part of all these stories about outrages were at one time found to be false and fabricated, and the Senate undoubtedly understood what was said by General Twiggs, in his communication with regard to the feeling of the people on the border, and the objects which those people had in keeping the troops in the field; but what has been done?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I must really rise to a point of order. I regret to do it when the Senator from Maine is on the floor, but I must make the point. It must necessarily draw a good deal more debate, and we are not debating the bill justly. My point is, that it is not in order, on a motion to take up a bill, to go at large into its merits; and so the discussion is entirely out of order.

Mr. CLAY, (to Mr. FESSENDEN.) You will admit that, I presume.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. CLAY. I presume the Senator, and every other Senator on the floor, will admit that it is out of order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will admit that, if it is out of order, it is an order that has never been followed in the Senate since I have been a member of it; but has been uniformly and universally disregarded.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOLK.) The Chair has already stated that, in his opinion, it was clearly out of order, and in violation of parliamentary law; but the practice has been followed in this body. If obliged to make a decision, the Chair must say that it is out of order to discuss the merits of a bill, pending a motion to take it up; but it has been the custom in this body.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If I understand the Chair to turn on the subject, I will obey the ruling, whatever it may be. I only want to know what the ruling is.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule, then, that this question is out of order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; I submit to the ruling.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on taking up the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays, and yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I should like to make a brief explanation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is out of order.

Mr. LANE. I wish to say a word in explanation before the vote is taken. The Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] said to me some two hours ago that he was going off to fulfill an engagement, and he desired me to pair with him. I stated that on any political question I would do so. Not regarding this as a political question, but being in favor of the bill, I am at liberty to vote. I shall therefore vote "yea."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, yeas—YEAS—YEAS, 27, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Briggs, Brown, Claiborne, Clifton, Davis, Douglas, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Hammond, Humphreys, Johnson, of Arkansas, Johnson, of Tennessee, Kennedy, Lane, Lathrop, Mason, Powell, Rice, Sinsbury, Sebastian, Wigfall, and Yates.

NAYS—Messrs. Bingham, Chandler, Collamer, Doolittle, Fessenden, Ford, Foster, Hale, Harlan, King, Simmons, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Willard.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As the bill is now taken up, and will be the unfinished business for tomorrow morning, and have precedence of all other business, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the Senator to permit me to make a motion of form before that is done. I move, with the consent of the Senator, that the further execution of the order of the Senate appointing Monday and Tuesday for Judiciary business be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. HUNTER. That has been done, I think. Mr. BENJAMIN. No; it has not been done. Let the Senate extend the order until Monday next for Judiciary business.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now renew the motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 6, 1860.

The House met at twelve o'clock, P. M.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PAY OF NAVAL AND MARINE OFFICERS.

THE SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a statement of the pay and allowances to the officers of the Navy and marine corps, during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1859; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

NAVY REGISTER.

THE SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting three hundred copies of the Navy Register for the current year, for the use of the members of the House of Representatives; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PAY AND MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Mileage be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the compensation now paid to members of Congress, to what it was formerly; that it be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of regulating and reducing the mileage now allowed to members of Congress; and that it have power to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. This is the last day the Committee on Commerce has for its reports. There has been some important business reported, and a bill for the regulation of a passenger order for to-day, which is the bill to protect female passengers in emigrant ships. I hope, therefore, that the House will allow us to proceed with that special order.

Mr. CLAYMEN. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN GEORGIA AND FLORIDA.

Mr. LOVE. I ask leave to offer a resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. If the morning hour has not commenced I will not object; but if this is to come out of it, I must object.

THE SPEAKER. The morning hour has not commenced.

Mr. BUFFINTON. There can be no objection to this resolution. Let it be read.

Mr. Love's resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas, in the recent settlement of the boundary question between the States of Georgia and Florida, a line has been run, and dealises will be adopted and affirmed by the two States, which will result in the exclusion of a large number of persons who have heretofore been considered citizens of said State of Georgia, and who hold claims of land in said State, and who are entitled to the same, and whereas it is not only important to these two States that this sacred question should be finally and finally settled, but also to the United States Government, do hereby:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and they are hereby instructed, to consider the expediency of reporting a bill and yielding any claim that the Government of the United States may have to lands on either side of said line, to all whose claims were good before said line was run.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, and agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business, if I am not the first to be answered.

Mr. COX. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. I was sick the other day when my committee was called.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to present a resolution in relation to the State of Georgia, in order that they may be referred to the appropriate committees, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business, in order that the morning hour may commence.

THE SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the reception of reports from the Committee on Commerce, and the first in order is the following bill, reported when the calendar was called, named H. R. No. 19, to amend an act entitled "An Act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships or other vessels," approved March 2, 1855, for the better protection of female passengers and for other purposes.

RESOLUTIONS OF GEORGIA.

Mr. CRAWFORD, by unanimous consent, presented the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of Georgia, which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution relative to the Branch Mint at Dahlburg. Whereas a serious effort was made in the last Congress to withhold the usual appropriations for the Branch Mint at Dahlonege, in this State, and thereby is effect to abolish the mine and wherever the said mine is of great and growing importance to the gold diggers of Lumpkin and the surrounding country, inasmuch as heavy sums of money are said to be being extracted from the mine and sold for gold, and thereby developing the gold buried in the mountains of Georgia; and whereas increasing quantities of gold are being extracted from the mine and sold for gold from the above causes, as well as from the fact that a large number of the citizens of upper Georgia are now engaged in mining in the Rocky Mountains, who return the ore for coinage at the Dahlonege mint; and whereas, the said mint at Dahlonege is almost the only one which directly benefits the actual laborer, the gold miner himself, and one of the few establishments of the Federal Government so early, wherein a gift of Federal money is expended on the people of the State.

It is resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of Georgia, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use all efforts in their power to procure the said mint, and to procure the usual appropriations therefor.

Resolved, That this Excellency the Governor be requested to transmit a copy of this preamble and resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

JAMES J. DIAMOND, Clerk of the House of Representatives.
T. L. GURNEY,
President of the Senate.

FREDERICK H. WEST, Secretary of the Senate.
Assented to December 15, 1859.

JOSEPH E. BROWN, Governor.
Mr. CRAWFORD also presented the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, which were severally referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed:

Remitted by the General Assembly, That our Senators be requested, and our Representatives in Congress be requested, to use their efforts to have the mail service which has lately been discontinued in Georgia put in operation again by the Postmaster-General, so that the facilities at present afforded are insufficient to meet the commercial, agricultural, and social wants of the people.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JAMES J. DIAMOND, Clerk of the House of Representatives.

FREDERICK H. WEST, Secretary of the Senate.
Assented to December 17, 1859.

JOSEPH E. BROWN, Governor.
Remitted by the General Assembly of the State of Georgia, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their influence to have the mail routes through the counties of Worth, and Wilkes, altered and changed from what they now are to what they were previous to the letting of the new contracts in 1856, so as to better the transmission of the mails, the facilities at the mail routes through said counties being in a wretched condition at the present time, and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to our members in Congress.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JAMES J. DIAMOND, Clerk of the House of Representatives.

FREDERICK H. WEST, Secretary of the Senate.
Assented to December 17, 1859.

JOSEPH E. BROWN, Governor.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.
Mr. BOCCOCK. I rise to a question of privilege. Upon examining the Journal I find that my name is not recorded on the vote yesterday on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BARKSDALE,] to suspend the rules, with a view to introduce a resolution to fix a period for the adjournment. I was in the House at the time, and have a distinct recollection that I voted. The recording of my vote will not change the result. I voted against suspending the rules, and I ask that the Journal be amended so as to record that vote. It was so ordered.

HEIRS OF JOHN PAULDING AND OTHERS.
Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported back, with a recommendation, that it do pass, a bill for the relief of the heirs of John Paulding, David Williams, Isaac Van Wert, and Sergeant John Champe; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. VANCE. I would appeal to the gentleman from New York to allow me to introduce a bill.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I have yielded repeatedly, and will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VANCE. I was accidently mistaken when the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was called the other day.

Mr. CASE. I object, for the reason that there are others similarly circumstanced.

Mr. VANCE. I wish to introduce the bill for reference.

Mr. GROW. I hope the rules will be enforced.

PROTECTION OF FEMALE EMIGRANTS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Commerce, to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the emigration of passengers in ships or other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, for the better protection of female passengers, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. JOHN COCHRANE to recommit the said bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the fortification bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That cannot take precedence of the business before the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. When this bill was last under consideration, I submitted a motion that it be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce. I now withdraw that motion, and move that the bill be passed on its passage.

I wish to say, in connection with the motion that I have made, very briefly, that this bill provides for the punishment of those who seduce, by solicitation, by gifts, females suspected of passenger ships upon the high seas. The punishment of that offense is one year's imprisonment or a fine not exceeding $1,000.

The second section of the bill provides that no subordinate officer or seaman on board any vessel, who attempts to visit the ship or to induce the emigrant passengers are placed, and that a violation of that provision shall be visited with the penalty of their wages during the voyage, and that the captain shall be visited with a penalty of fifty dollars for permitting it.

The third section provides that the captain shall be placed publicly upon the vessel notices to the effect that seamen are prohibited from visiting the part of the vessel where the emigrant passengers are, and inflicts a penalty on him of fifty dollars for the omission to do so. There is no reason why if the court, in its discretion, shall choose, it shall double the fines in these several instances to the female who has been injured. The time of limitation, as fixed by the bill, is one year from the time of the commission of the offense.

Since I occupied the floor the other day, numerous suggestions have been made to me as to the propriety of two alterations in the bill, and I have supposed that those alterations are proper. One is, that the third section, the notice to be given shall be couched, not only in the English language, but in the French and German; and the other is, that the time of limitation, instead of being only one year from the commission of the offense, shall be one year from the time of the arrival of the vessel in port.

The reason of the first alteration is obvious. That of the second is to be found in the fact that passenger vessels frequently, by stress of weather, are upon the sea some three, four, or five months; so that if the period of the limitation be taken from the time of the commission of the offense, the limitation may, perhaps, be too short, which will be provided for and obviated by such an amendment as I propose to submit, namely, one year from the time of the arrival of the vessel in port. I now offer the amendment which I send up, and upon it I shall demand the previous question.

The amendment was read; as follows:

Insert in line four of section three, between the words "notice" and "containing," the words, "in the English, French, and German languages;" and strike from line five the last words thereof, namely, "the commission of the offense;" and insert the words, "the arrival of the ship or vessel at the port for which she was destined when the offense was committed."

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment presented by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and announced that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

● CODIFICATION OF THE REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back to the House a bill (H. R. No. 21) for the simplification and codification of the existing revenue laws of the United States, and plan other purposes.

Mr. Speaker, most of the members of the House understand this bill intimately. I may say here that it has been very materially and radically changed from its condition when offered to the last Congress. Innovations have been abandoned, and it has been deemed best to provide for the existing laws only those amendments which are necessary for their enforcement—amendments which have been adopted by the Treasury Department, and have prevailed under its administration during the last year, without the action of law-makers, and, therefore, without the possibility of reference by our judicial tribunals to law to control and modify them, when presented in cases for judicial examination.

This bill, sir, has had devoted to it seven years of labor. The members, as they stand here, have simply collated, with the amendments annexed, which I have referred to. Those laws that are in conflict with adjudicated law have been repealed; and those which are doubtful have been changed to the language of judicial decisions. I have adopted, sir, the law recognized, and which has been advised by the Committee on Commerce, that the bill should present upon its face indications by which every member consulting it, may perceive what part of it is old and what part of it is new; so that they may carry away each member of the House, as he finds time to take up the bill, will know what it is that is proposed to him to record his vote upon.

It is of the utmost importance, Mr. Speaker, that this bill should be considered. The interests of commerce are very largely affected by the new limited and confined by an imperfect code of revenue laws. More inadequate laws are operative upon the transactions of commerce all over the land. Lawyers are interested in the passage of this bill; merchants are interested; all classes of any degree connected with the transactions of commerce have a direct, intimate, and extended interest in the subject of the bill. And, sir, it is for the purpose of asking this House that the further consideration of this bill shall be postponed to some future day certain, the members during the interim thus having an opportunity for consulting it and learning its facts, and forming an intelligent judgment upon it—that I have made the remarks I have just submitted to the House. I have selected that period which is compatible with action, and not unduly taxing the remaining business of this House, to which to move that the bill be postponed; and I trust that there will not be a solitary objection. I say, in my place now, sir, that at the time to which I propose to postpone the further consideration of this bill, should more important business require attention or should there be objection to its consideration, based upon a reasonable intimation from gentlemen that they do not understand the bill, I will give way and permit its consideration to be postponed to another day. I am sure that should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, there to be considered as a special order. I move, then, that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until the fourth Tuesday of the present month, the 27th instant.

Mr. MAYNARD. Unless we be so ordered, we agree to fix a later day for the postponement. I will be constrained to object.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I have made my motion, and I call for the vote on it. I cannot consent, with my present information, to a later postponement.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to my colleague on the Committee on Commerce to call for the previous question; for it will bring the House to a vote on the passage of the bill at this time. There will be no objection to the postponement of the further consideration of the bill, and there will be no objection to ordering the bill to be printed.

Mr. MAYNARD. Certainly. I want the postponement to a day later than that which has been stated. I would suggest between the 1st and 10th of April.

Mr. CLEMENS. I am satisfied we ought to agree to the postponement of the bill to the time stated by the gentleman from Tennessee; and that suggestion is adopted, it is obvious it will obviate all difficulty in reference to the course proposed by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Then I agree to modify my motion to the extent that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the first Tuesday in April.

Mr. GROW. Is it moved to make this bill a special order on the day to which it is proposed to postpone it?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Not at all. Mr. GROW. Neither in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union nor in the House? I am opposed to the bill being made a special order.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I do not propose that it shall be made a special order, but only that it shall be postponed to the day which I have named.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the proposition to be for a postponement, and not for a special order.

Mr. GROW. I object to this system of postponement. The Committee on Commerce, under the rules, are entitled to two days in which to submit their reports. Now, suppose they postpone the further consideration of one half of their reports to other days; when those days are reached they will consume further time, prevent any other business being taken up in the morning hour, and unfairly interfere during that morning hour with the business of the other standing committees.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I am not in error that isthis; this business is privileged to the extent that it ought to take precedence of any other business less important. I have already stated in my place that, should business of greater importance, necessary to the administration of the Government, or to carrying on the business of this House, intervene, I will readily yield to its consideration. I make the motion for the postponement of the further consideration of this bill for the benefit of the members of this House in order that they may have time in which to consult the pages of the bill, and to learn what it is that it is proposed to them to vote for.

Mr. GROW. Under the rules of the House, I will repeat, each committee is allowed two days in which to make its reports. If committees, when they make reports, postpone their consideration to future days, one committee, by that practice, might absorb the whole session with the business of that committee.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The gentleman is entirely in error in the opposition he makes. Under the former rules, committees had the floor for reports in the morning hour as against all privileged questions; and now, the question is, whether a committee should have the floor two days is one addressed to the discretion of the House. To that discretion—that reasonable discretion, as I claim—I have appealed, when I named the facts in the case, and asked for the postponement of the further consideration of this bill to the day I have indicated. I now address that motion for a postponement to the intelligence and to the equity of this House. It is as clear as light that this subject demands the early and speedy action of the Congress of the United States. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed till the first Tuesday of next month; and I ask for a vote on that motion.

Mr. GROW. If the gentleman will make his motion to postpone to apply after the morning hour of the day to which he moves to postpone the bill, I will make no objection. But I do object to a committee reporting, and then postponing the consideration of their business to a certain day, to be brought up in the morning hour, thereby swamping the committees which follow.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I presume the gentleman from New York will so modify his motion.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I will move that it be postponed until the first Tuesday of April, to be taken up after the morning hour, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.
Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move that there be printed five hundred extra copies.
The motion was referred to the Committee on Printing, under the rules.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, from the Committee on Commerce, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were laid on the table, and the committee discharged from the further consideration thereof:

A bill for the erection of a custom-house, post office, &c., at Apalachicola; and

A bill for the erection of marine hospitals at Memphis, Tennessee, and Apalachicola, Florida.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT CHICAGO.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution providing for the sale and use of expending the balance of appropriation for repairing the works and piers, in order to preserve and secure the light-house at Chicago, Illinois; which was read a first and second time.

The resolution, which was read, provides that the unexpended balance now remaining of the appropriation made March 3, 1859, for repairing the works and piers, in order to preserve and secure the light-house at Chicago, Illinois, be expended in repairing and improving the harbor of Chicago; provided that nothing in said bill contained shall interfere with so much of said appropriation as may have been already required by the Light-House Board for repairs in order to secure said light-house, but that the same shall be expended in accordance with such requisition.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say that the last Congress made an appropriation of some eighty-seven thousand dollars for the purpose of repairing the piers and light-house, in order to preserve the harbor of Chicago. A portion of that money has been expended, but there is yet an unexpended balance. We merely wish to change the direction of it, and apply it to cleaning out the harbor, in order that the commerce of that lake may be protected, and to save the resolution put upon its passage, and I call the previous question upon its engrossment and third reading.

The previous question was seconded, and the resolution ordered to be printed and read in the operation thereof, the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. The resolution being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded.
Mr. BRANCH. I would like to know of the gentleman from Illinois whether the resolution in his joint resolution covers an amount that will undoubtedly be sufficient to secure the light-house, so that no possible occasion will arise calling for a further appropriation?

Mr. E. A. WORTH. It unquestionably does.

Mr. GARRETT. What amount does the resolution cover?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What remains of an appropriation of $87,000—about sixty-four thousand dollars.

The main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the resolution.

Tellers on the yeas and nays were called for.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was then passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, from the Committee on Public Lands, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were laid on the table, and the committee discharged from the further consideration thereof:

The memorial of the Legislature of Nebraska, asking a grant of land to aid in testing the navigability of the Platte river;

The memorial and joint resolution relative to school lands in the Indian reservation in Richardson county, Nebraska; and

The petition of the commissioners of common schools of the Territory of Nebraska.

BOUNTY LANDS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, from the same committee, also reported a joint resolution for satisfying claims for bounty lands and for other purposes.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. There will be no objection to the passage of this bill, and I therefore move that it be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the act entitled "An act giving further time for satisfying claims for bounty lands and for other purposes," approved February 8, 1854, and the act entitled "An act to provide for satisfying claims for bounty lands for military services in the late war with Great Britain and for other purposes," approved July 27, 1842, and also the two acts, approved January 27, 1854, and thereupon revised, shall be revived and continued in force, without restriction or limitation as to time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was subsequently read the third time and passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOUSTEAD BILL.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report a bill to secure homesteads to small settlers on the public domain.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and I will state, at the same time, that the bill is so framed as to reconsider the vote by which it may be so referred.

Mr. BRANCH. I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not yet been referred. The question is on referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and it was agreed to.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the bill has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BRANCH. And I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The gentleman from North Carolina may make that motion; but I hope it will be understood by the House that the purpose I have had in view was not to consume the morning hour in putting the bill on the passage, but still to reserve, so that it may be filed up at some future time, that the House may act upon it.

Several Republican MEMBERS. Fix a day.

Mr. BRANCH. I hope the House will understand that this movement is to put the homestead bill in such a position that it can be brought back before the House, to be voted on whenever the friends of the bill desire to do so.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is what we want.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope there will be no objection to this. I simply want to have the bill in such a position that it can be brought up at some future time, when the House will not be too much engrossed.

Mr. NOELL. I desire to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I want an opportunity to discuss this bill before it is put upon its passage.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I want to submit the question whether any gentleman can take the floor from me to make the motion to lay on the table?

Mr. BRANCH. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BRANCH. Did not the gentleman from Illinois yield the floor?

Mr. LOVEJOY. No, sir; I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. BRANCH. Then I give notice that, when to respond to the invitation of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ADAIR. I withdraw the nomination of Mr. Davidson.

Mr. HINDMAN. I am informed by friends of Mr. Sunderland, that he does not desire to be voted for as Chaplain. I therefore withdraw his nomination.

The House then proceeded, in execution of its order, to vote à la fois for Chaplain of the House for the Thirty-Sixth Congress, with the following result: Whole number of votes, 189; necessary to a choice, 95; of which—

Rev. Mr. Proctor received	41

For Rev. Mr. Holmes—Mr. Kigs.

For Rev. Mr. Davidson—Mr. H. H. Harris.

For Rev. Mr. Beecher—Mr. Farnsworth.

candidates on the respective sides; and my proposition to the House is this: that I shall be permitted to offer a resolution declaring a particular gentleman Chaplain; that the other side shall be permitted to offer an amendment, proposing to substitute another name for it; that then the previous question shall be called, and that this matter shall be settled by two votes.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to take.

Mr. SIEMAN. I suggest that we take the names of candidates, whoever they are, and vote for them.

Mr. McKnight. I object to that.

Mr. BRANCH. The difficulty is, that we cannot prevent gentlemen voting for who they please.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina is objected to.

Mr. BRANCH. I do not press it. I see that it is objected to; and it can only be done by unanimous consent.

Several Members asked leave to change their votes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that it would be better to take another vote. No result can be attained by this continual changing of votes. The Chair hears an objection to that course. This vote is therefore closed.

Mr. KILGORE. I move that the election be postponed until the first Monday in December next.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order until the result of the vote has been announced.

Mr. KILGORE. I understood the Speaker to announce that the vote was terminated.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to change my vote.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order. The Chair understands that, by unanimous consent, another vote is taken, and that no further changes of vote are to be allowed.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

Mr. SIEMAN. I move that whoever gets the largest number of votes on the next ballot shall be declared Chaplain of this House.

MEMBERS on both sides objected.

The SPEAKER. That proposition can only be entertained by unanimous consent, and objection is made by members from all sides.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I move that Mr. Proctor be declared Chaplain of the House by acclamation.

Mr. McKnight. I move to amend by substituting the name of Mr. Stockton.

Mr. CLEMENS. I favor that amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN. Is "Object?"

The SPEAKER. The proposition cannot be entertained, objection being made.

Mr. KILGORE. I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until December next.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I object. The motion is not in order unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. SIEMAN. Let us have a vote between the two who have had the highest number of votes on the last ballot.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. All these propositions are out of order; for, since the House has agreed, by unanimous consent, to take another vote. It is, therefore—that order having been made by the House—not in order to move for a postponement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The House agreed that another vote should be taken, and all other propositions are out of order unless by unanimous consent. [Cries of "Call the roll" and "Let us vote!"]

Mr. KILGORE. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RUFFIN. I never heard of the understanding that is referred to.

The SPEAKER. It was the understanding, and because of that understanding gentlemen ceased to question of order, that the motion I made was, as the Chair believes, distinctly agreed to.

Mr. KILGORE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. I moved that the further consideration of this question be postponed until next December, upon which the gentleman from Maine raised a question of order, that the motion I made was not in order because the House had agreed by unanimous consent to take another vote. I insist that my motion is in order, and I therefore take an appeal from the decision of the Chair sustaining the point of order by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BOCK. I move that that appeal be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND VOTE FOR CHAPLAIN.

The House proceeded the second time to vote for Chaplain, with the following result: Whole number of votes cast, 189, necessary to a choice, 95; of which—

Rev. Mr. Stockton received	111
Rev. Mr. Proctor	70
Rev. Mr. Bull	2

For Rev. Mr. Bull—Messrs. Green Adams and Thayer.

For Rev. Mr. Merrill—Messrs. Hughes and Taylor.

For Rev. Mr. Fox—Messrs. Foster and Tappan.

For Rev. Mr. Knapp—Mr. Holman.

Pending the above call,

Mr. WHITELEY moved that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. No motion is in order pending a division of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDSON withdrew the name of Mr. Denney as a candidate.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Rhode Island, stated that his colleague, Mr. BRAYTON, was paired with Mr. STEWART, of Maryland.

Mr. FLORENCE said that he would change from the gentleman for whom he before voted, and vote for Mr. Stockton, whom he understood to be a pure and pious man and a good Bible Christian.

Mr. MARTIN, of Virginia, withdrew the name of Mr. Stockton as a candidate for the office.

Mr. FLORENCE said that he understood to be a Constitution and Union-loving man, and a sectarian in no sense of the word.

Mr. MONTGOMERY withdrew the name of Mr. Holmes, and voted for Mr. Stockton.

Mr. NIBLACK withdrew the name of Mr. Nadin.

Mr. ETHERIDGE said that he was satisfied Mr. Ball could not be elected, and he therefore changed his vote to Mr. Stockton.

Mr. CONKLING said that, fearing there was some error in the list of members being elected, he would vote for Mr. Stockton.

The vote was then announced, as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, in the chair) declared Rev. THOMAS H. BRAYTON, of Rhode Island, Chaplain of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-Sixth Congress.

VISIT TO MOUNT VERNON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communicating communication: "The members and officers of the House of Representatives are invited to accompany the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association on a special trip to the home of Washington, being the first of the season, by the way of the place becomes their property, and that of the nation. A steamer must be somewhat humbling to the pride of the head of that distinguished special committee.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I rise to a question of order. I want to hear this speech; but I cannot hear it unless members are compelled to take their seats.

The SPEAKER pro tempore directed members to resume their seats.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to finish my remarks upon one other point, and then I will allow the gentleman to proceed.

Mr. FRENCH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman can ask it now.

Mr. FRENCH. I would ask the gentleman from Alabama, then, on what authority he makes the statement here that the treasurer of Maine has declared that he expended thousands of dollars of the money of the State treasury for election purposes?

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, my authority for making reference to that Maine defalcation is what I have seen, and what I presume every gentleman has seen, in the newspapers, and in papers published in the State of Maine, purporting to give the facts.

Mr. FRENCH. I wish to state to the gentleman from Alabama that the whole of that story was an entire fabrication—a fabrication made by the editor of the Bangor Union, without the slightest foundation whatever; and I have begun inquired that he himself has since been compelled to acknowledge, under oath, before an investigating committee, that it was entirely unauthorized and false.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman from Maine say that there was no default on the part of the treasury?

Mr. FRENCH. That was not the question in controversy.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, I desire to have that question answered here. Let us deal frankly with each other.

Mr. FRENCH. I do not deny that there was a defalcation there.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman admits that there was a defalcation, but—

Mr. FRENCH. But I deny that the treasurer stated that the money was used for election purposes.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, then, I want to call the attention of this investigating committee to that defalcation in Maine. [Laughter.] I want them to inquire whether the statement that it was used in elections is not true, and find out what became of the money. And the statement has been made, and I have no doubt with more truth than is found in the gentleman's resolutions. The gentleman says that an investigating committee in Maine found that statement to be incorrect. That may be, and I have no doubt that the investigations in the gentleman's resolutions are untrue; and if the committee will do its duty, it will so find.

Mr. FRENCH. Well, I wish to say to the gentleman from Alabama—

Mr. HOUSTON. There was a substantial foundation for the charges and investigation in that case. There is none in the one noted on yesterday, as shown by the resolutions themselves.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me one moment?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRENCH. I wish to say this: that the charge of defalcation is now being investigated before a committee. The State of Maine will endeavor to ferret out only the extent of the defalcation, but the manner in which that defalcation was produced, and will spread the facts before the country, to the satisfaction, I have no doubt, of even the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOUSTON. And, Mr. Speaker, my very distinguished investigating committee, presided over by its distinguished chairman, [Mr. Covode,] can probably render them some assistance; for it is directed to examine whether any, and what amount of money has been expended in elections, and to inform, also, to report the names of the parties to the House, and I intend he shall have no excuse for overlooking the Maine elections, and I therefore bring it to his notice. A very interesting employment for the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I wish, also, to call his attention to the election of Printer to this House, so that he may find out whether there was any division of spoils there.

Mr. COVODE. I tell the gentleman from Alabama that it was Mr. Buchanan who made the charge of money being used to influence elections, and I was only proposing to help him find out what the facts were.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, that is an excellent, suitable, most suitable, that could be resorted to. [Derisive laughter from the Republican benches.] I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he intends that his committee shall examine and find out whether the charges made by the letter writers in this Capitol, and published in the newspapers, are true, to the effect that Mr. Defrees's expenses were paid so as to get him off the track for Printer? Will his committee inquire whether any division of the printing spoils was made by his own side of the House? and if so, on what principle it was made? These are important and grave questions; and I hope the gentleman will meet and investigate them; he has the committee, and I want no sulking of investigation. Let the public know the truth, and the whole of it, concerning these charges of corruption. The gentleman shall have no excuse for concealment.

Mr. COVODE. I would say to the gentleman from Alabama—

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir, I will not be interrupted by you just now. [Laughter.] Now, I would like to know whether that investigating committee intends to extend its inquiries into all these charges, involving his own party, that have been published in almost every newspaper that professes to publish anything of what takes place in this Capitol? Does that committee intend to examine into and report upon the truth of these charges?

Mr. COVODE. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that, as far as my influence goes in these matters, I will economize as much as possible; but I would not attempt to invent a matter unless I had good reason to believe that there was something in it.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman says he will, so far as his influence goes, economize. Possibly he may economize; but I hope it may not induce corruption in examination into the conduct of his own party friends who are under charges of improper conduct.

Mr. COVODE. If the gentleman from Alabama wants a committee to investigate into those matters, I will vote for it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Sir, we have a committee; and if that committee will do its duty, if it will but discharge its duty faithfully, it will examine into these things and report the truth to the House.

No additional committee is necessary for such investigation, and I have no doubt that the resolution does not cover the ground; it seems to me it is broad enough to cover almost anything and everything.

Mr. COVODE. If the gentleman from Alabama will furnish me with direct charges with regard to the conduct of his own party friends, I will be glad to refer to them, in reference to any matter proper to come before my committee, I shall investigate them.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman wants me to furnish him with direct charges. What direct charges is he resolved to put forth throughout the country? Are they not the vaguest insinuations that ever were presented for the consideration of sensible men. What do they charge? Tell me, against whom do they make a charge? They contain no such thing, and should never have been entertained by any body.

Mr. COVODE. Well, if the gentleman insinuates that any guilt attaches to any parties, I will investigate.

Mr. HOUSTON. Why, sir, the insinuations are all over the country, as I have fork throughout the country, and the gentleman cannot be ignorant of the fact, and if he shall refuse to investigate them, the plea that he was ignorant that such charges existed, will avail him nothing before an honest public.

Mr. COVODE. Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman desire to ask me a question?

Mr. HOARD. No, sir; I thought the gentleman was through.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not quite, sir. I did not expect, Mr. Speaker, to occupy the floor as long as I have done. I desire to see this investigation had, and such is the desire of this side of the House. We demand it. It is due to truth that it be had; it is due to the persons whose characters were attempted to be aspersed, that it be not stifled. I would not have it stopped if I could. I want it to proceed. We desire a full and fair investigation.

And upon Mr. Speaker, if I am permitted to do so, before I yield the floor, I will move that this resolution be referred to the committee that was created yesterday on motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOARD. I did not yield the floor for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York as yielding the floor to the gentleman from Alabama to make a few remarks only.

Mr. HOUSTON. Very well; I shall interpose no sort of difficulty. The gentleman shall have his committee; and shall leave his investigation; and all I ask is, that it shall be pursued, and that the truth shall be fully and fairly brought out.

Mr. HOARD resumed the floor.

Mr. HASKIN. I ask the gentleman from New York to afford me an opportunity to say a few words on the subject embraced in the resolution.

I want to give the reasons why I cannot vote to refer this subject to another special committee.

Mr. HOARD. I designed to move the previous question; but I will give way for a few moments to my colleague, before doing so.

Mr. BURNETT. I insist that the gentleman from New York shall either retain the floor himself, or yield it absolutely—one or the other.

Mr. BRADY. I have yielded the floor to the gentleman from New York in under a misapprehension. There is no motion pending to refer this resolution to the special committee appointed yesterday.

Mr. HASKIN. But I want to give the reasons why I think it ought to be referred to that committee.

Mr. HOARD. I will yield to my colleague, if he will demand the previous question when he is through.

Mr. HASKIN. I will do so. It will be remembered by the House that a few days since, I proposed a resolution for disbanding a special committee appointed upon motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Grew,] and referring the subject-matter that had been referred to that special committee, under his resolution, to a regular standing committee of the House, of which I have the honor to be chairman. I did it because I was anxious that some system should exist here on this subject of investigations.

The subject-matters embraced in the resolution proposed by my colleague from New York were referred to the regular committee, to a special committee, of which Mr. Covode will probably be chairman. As I understand it, the primary object of the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Covode] was to require into the regular committee, to a special committee, of which Mr. Buchanan and his Cabinet in carrying through the last Congress the LeCompton constitution. Having myself moved to disband the select committee appointed on motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Grew,] although anxious to have the subject-matters embraced in the resolution of my colleague [Mr. Hoard] should be examined into, I cannot, consistently, vote to refer his resolution to a new select committee.

Sir, this creating of additional select committees, in my judgment, will be reduced to a perfect farce. As chairman of the Committee on Expenditures, I insist that where there is an appropriate committee in existence, the House should insist upon retrenchment and reform, by keeping these matters before the public, giving liberty to all my colleagues, especially as I am one of those who have been referred to by name in his resolution, that he will consent that that resolution be referred to the committee appointed under the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Hoard]. I do not desire to give liberty to a committee to examine into the subjects embraced in his resolution.

Mr. HOARD. This resolution is introduced with the consent of Mr. COVODE.

Mr. HASKIN. I voted yesterday for the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Covode), and I did it cheerfully, for I am anxious to have many of the matters referred to in it examined; but if he and his friends intend that the subject embraced in his resolution—some twenty—shall be parceled out among different committees, then retrenchment and reform are not advocated by that side of the House.

I intend, so far as I am concerned, during this session, to act with them in favor of exposing corruption wherever it may exist; but I want to keep them within the line of duty in keeping down the enormous expenses of this Government; and therefore I say that this resolution should go to the committee created yesterday by the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Those gentlemen upon the other side of the House must look out, or they will get the laugh upon them for raising unnecessary special committees upon vague rumors. Before moving the previous question, as I promised to do, I appeal to my colleague to allow me to move to refer his resolution to the committee appointed yesterday on motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOARD. I must decline to do that. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HINDMAN. I appeal to the gentleman from New York to withdraw the demand for the previous question, and to offer, as an amendment, the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HOARD. I must decline to yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HINDMAN. I ask that it be read for information.

Mr. HOARD. I decline to yield for that purpose.

THE SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order to have it read, unless the gentleman from New York withdraws the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HINDMAN. Let it be read only for information. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. HOARD. It is time to adjourn, and I must object.

Mr. HINDMAN. I only ask that it shall be read for information.

THE SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HOARD. Yes; object.

Mr. HINDMAN. I still have the floor, and I resign to read the resolution myself for the purpose of letting the gentleman from New York know what it is.

[Mr. HINDMAN then, amidst deafening shouts of "Order!" from the Republican benches, and the utmost confusion and uproar, proceeded to read his amendment to the resolution; the purport of which was an instruction to the committee to inquire whether any money was used corruptly to procure the election of any member of the House; and also, whether any corrupt means were used, or proposed, to influence the election of any of the House; and to inquire generally into any and all charges preferred against members of the House, or officers of the General Government.]

THE SPEAKER pro tempore repeatedly called the gentleman from Arkansas to order, and requested him to take his seat.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Illinois. I want to hear the resolutions that gentlemen have to offer, and I am opposed to stifling any such charges as may be presented, setting forth any specific charges against officers of this Government.

Mr. HINDMAN. Are you of the other side determined to muzzle investigation?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. If the previous question is called, then this debate is not in order.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and he proposed that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. I insist that I rose and addressed the Speaker before the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who could not lay any claim of precedence to it over me, under the rules, as he was not the mover of the resolution.

THE SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not see the gentleman from Kentucky at all.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I wish to inquire whether it is in order for a resolution, read despite objection and repeated decisions of the Speaker to the contrary, to be included by the reporters for the Globe in their report of our debates?

THE SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has no control over the Globe.

Mr. HINDMAN. Does the gentleman wish to abridge the freedom of the press? Does his party object to full and fair inquiry into all charges against all officers of the Government? Is the original resolution a mere party move, intended to make capital for Black Republicans, but designed to hide their own corruptions? If so, the people of the United States will put the right estimate upon it. If Republicans wish to conceal the fact that I have attempted to institute a general and impartial inquiry into all Federal corruptions, they will exclude my resolution from the Globe; otherwise they will let it appear there.

Then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (at twenty minutes to five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 7, 1860.

THE Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

THE VICE PRESIDENT announced the appointment of Mr. LAYMAN to fill the vacancies on the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Committee on Territories, and the Committee on Enrolled Bills, made vacant by the retirement of Mr. HAYS.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

An act (No. 237) for the relief of Anthony Schacter, to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

An act (No. 241) authorizing publishers to print on their papers the date when subscriptions expire—to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

An act (No. 279) providing for satisfying claims for bounty lands and for other purposes—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A joint resolution (No. 11) providing for the manner of expending the balance of appropriation for repairing the works and piers, in order to preserve and secure the light-house at Chicago, Illinois—to the Committee on Commerce.

An act (No. 19) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels" approved March 3, 1853, for the better protection of female passengers and for other purposes—to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented seven petitions of manufacturers, coal operators, merchants, farmers, mechanics, miners, and laborers, of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, praying such a modification of the tariff as will protect the industrial interests of the country; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Brooklyn, New York, praying Congress to pass a law to prevent all further traffic in and monopoly of the public lands, and that they be laid out in farms and lots for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Joseph Pater, a sergeant in the war of 1812, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TEN EYCK presented the petition of Richard Stout, praying compensation for carrying the mail from Easton, Pennsylvania, via New Brunswick, to New York; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DAVIS presented the memorial of C. T. Alexander, in relation to his rank in the medical corps of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the petition of J. Hooford Smith, late United States consul at Beirut, Syria, praying an increase of compensation for diplomatic services in negotiating a treaty with the Kingdom of Spain, while consul general at Japan, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Thomas W. Harris, praying compensation for diplomatic services in negotiating a treaty with the Kingdom of Spain, while consul general at Japan, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FITCH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 254) to confirm certain entries of land therein named; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a communication from the Mayor of Washington, inclosing a copy of a joint resolution of the Board of Aldermen and Board of Common Council of that city, instructing the committee appointed to represent the interests of the city before Congress to ask an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Potomac river, asked to be discharged from its consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James and Theodore Walters, praying that certain lots of ground in the city of Washington may be conveyed to them, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of L. A. Gobright and others, in behalf of the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of the District of Columbia, praying an act of incorporation, reported a bill (S. No. 252) to incorporate the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia; which was read, and ordered to be second reading.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of the legal representatives of Wetonaw, son of James Conner, deceased, praying the payment of a sum of money adjudged to be paid to said Wetonaw, by an Indian trader, considering a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 253) for the relief of the legal representatives of Wetonaw, son of James Conner. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the legal representatives of John G. Mackall, praying indemnity for the destruction of a house during the war with Great Britain, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William G. Ridgely, of the District of Columbia, praying indemnity for tobacco destroyed by the British in the war of 1812, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Hodges & Lansdale, praying indemnity for property destroyed by the British in the war of 1812, submitted an adverse report which was ordered to be printed.

RECOMMITTAL.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was Ordered, That the petition of Mrs. Mary B. Smith, widow of the late Brecht Brander General J. B. W. Smith, of the United States Army, praying to be allowed a pension, with the adverse report thereon, be recommended to the Committee on Pensions.

CODIFICATION OF STATUTES.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to consider the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of a committee to revise the public laws of the United States; to supply their language; to correct their inaccuracies; to simplify their deficiencies; to arrange them so as to render them as far as possible consistent text; and to report them thus improved to Congress for its final action, to the end that the public statutes, which are are presumed to know, may be in such form as to be more easily the appropriation of all.

POCAHONTAS INDIANS.

Mr. HUNTER. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill of the House of Representatives (No. 216) making appropriations for fulfilling the treaty stipulations with the Pocom Indians, and with certain bands of Indians in the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington, for the year ending June 30, 1860, have directed me to report it back with certain amendments. I will state that this is merely to carry out treaty stipulations with certain Indian tribes, ratified at the last extra session of the Senate, and I ask that it may be considered and acted on now. I will take no time. If it does not, I will press it.

There being no objection, the Senate, and Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 216) making appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Pocom Indians, and with certain bands of Indians in the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington, for the year ending June 30, 1860.

The bill was reported back from the Committee on Finance with certain amendments. The first amendment of the committee was, after line (twenty-four), to insert:

For maintaining and subsisting the Pocoms during the one year after their removal to their new home, purchasing stock and agricultural implements, breaking up and tracing out building lots, and in making such other improvements as may be necessary for their comfort and welfare, per second article of the treaty of the 13th of March, 1860, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to add:

To provide the Pocoms with a mill suitable for grinding grain and sawing timber, one or more mechanic shops, with all building tools, and in making such other improvements as may be necessary for their comfort and welfare, per second article of the treaty of the 13th of March, 1860, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to add:

To provide and set apart such sum as enable the Pocoms to adjust and settle their existing obligations and engagements, and to provide for the compensation of the services of citizens of the United States prior to the date of the ratification of this agreement, so far as the same may be legally provided for by their agents to be valid and just, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, per second article of the treaty of the 13th of March, 1860, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended. The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the amendments be voted upon together or separately? ["All together!"]

The amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

TEXAS MOUNTED VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. DAVIS. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 18) making appropriations for the support of one regiment of Texas mounted volunteers, authorized by the act of Congress approved April 7, 1858, and instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and recommend that it be passed, and to ask for its present consideration.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me we had better consider it in this shape than as an amendment to the appropriation bill. If it is to be decided upon, there will be no trouble in going on with the West Point bill afterwards. As I understand it, this bill is the same as the amendment of the Senator from Texas. It is the same subject.

Mr. DAVIS. It is the same subject, and covers the same question.

Mr. HUNTER. This is the bill as matured by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GWIN. I will suggest to the Senator from Virginia that we may get into a difficulty with the House by sending them an appropriation bill; and therefore I think we had better take up the West Point bill and ascertain, by examining the question, whether or not we shall not be forced to put this as an amendment on that bill; otherwise the House might not consider the bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, on the ground of its being an appropriation bill, and as infruging upon their rights. I merely make the suggestion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to understand what bill it is that is proposed to be taken up? There seems to be some difference of opinion about it.

Mr. DAVIS. It is a bill which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to provide an appropriation for a regiment of mounted volunteers which was authorized by a law passed on the 7th of April last.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to that being taken up, except that I understand there will be a motion to adjourn at a pretty early hour, and to-day was assigned, by common consent, to the Senator from Ohio, to address the Senate. If this bill be taken up, it will unquestionably lead to debate.

Mr. HUNTER. It will come up after the Senator from Ohio has concluded his speech, as the unfinished business, if we take it up now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it does not interfere with the Senator from Ohio, I have no sort of objection.

Mr. GWIN. I desire to go on with the bill in the same manner as not to interrupt the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose the special order on which he is to speak will come up at half past twelve o'clock to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. At one o'clock.

Mr. GWIN. I should prefer taking up the West Point bill now. By the time the Senator from Ohio wishes to proceed with his remarks, I think we can dispose of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Ohio must wait to proceed now; because, if motion is to be made at two or three o'clock to adjourn, of course he will have no time to make his speech unless he commences at once.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Three o'clock was the time spoken of.

Mr. GWIN. If the Senator wishes to proceed, I will not press the bill now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to its being taken up; I shall not object to it, provided it does not interfere with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GWIN. If the Senator wishes to proceed now, I will not make my motion. I thought was understood that he was to proceed half past one o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir.

Mr. GWIN. I have no objection to his proceeding with the understanding that we shall take up the bill after he is through.

Mr. WIGFALL. I hope the Senator will proceed now with his remarks; and as soon as he is through we can take up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Several Senators. That is right.

Mr. WIGFALL. I have no wish to interfere with the Senator's speech.

Mr. WADE. I am entirely willing to begin now, or at any other time, or on any other day. I have no particular desire about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no objection to taking up the bill from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. GWIN. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then it must lie over.

PRESIDENTIAL PATRONAGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further morning business, the next business in order is the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] on the 7th of February, for a select committee to inquire into the extent of the patronage of the President of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. Let that matter lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolution will lie over.

METEOROLOGICAL REPORTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the following resolution, reported by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. FRY], from the Committee on Printing, on the 7th of February last:

Resolved, That there be printed, in addition to the annual number, in quarto form, with the plates to illustrate the same, the reports and copies of the report of the Commissioner of Patents on meteorological observations, for the use of the Commissioner of Patents and the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. FOOTE. Let that lie over for the present. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the following resolution, submitted by the Senator from California [Mr. GWIN] on the 14th of February:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message as refers to the construction of a Pacific railroad be referred to a select committee, to be composed of nine members, to be appointed by the President of the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that will lie over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolution will lie over.

PROPERTY IN TERRITORIES.

Mr. WADE. I suppose we might as well come directly to the resolutions that are to be under consideration—the resolutions offered by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BAILEY]—on which it is understood that I have the floor. I move, therefore, to postpone all prior orders, with a view of taking up those resolutions.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Mississippi on the 18th of January.

Mr. WADE, who was entitled to the floor, proceeded to address the Senate, and spoke until two o'clock, when he was interrupted, and having arrived for another special order—the homestead bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BATES in the chair.) The Senator from Ohio will allow the Chair to suggest that the business under consideration of the special order has arrived; and it must be taken up, unless otherwise directed by the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the special order be postponed until the Senator has finished his remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I have no objection to its being postponed, if by general consent it retain its present position, until the Senator has done speaking.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is any particular hour suggested by the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Until the Senator from Ohio has concluded his speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, unless there be objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. WADE resumed and concluded his speech.

[This speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. TOOMBS. I shall detain the Senate but a few moments in a brief reply to so much of the remarks of the Senator from Ohio as had special reference to myself; and if it be the pleasure of the Senate, I will go on now, provided that by so doing I do not interfere with any friend from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The Senator from Texas has just given me the unfinished business, and the Senator from Georgia wishes now to make a short reply to the Senator from Ohio. By way of comity to all parties, and with a certain expectation that the Senate will, in-morrow, at half past one o'clock, take up the homestead bill, I move to postpone the special order until that hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The special order is the bill (S. No. 1) to grant to every person who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres, &c. The Senator from Tennessee moves to postpone that bill until to-morrow at half past one o'clock, and to make it the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOOMBS then addressed the Senate in reply to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WADE responded.

[These speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire, at as early a day as the Senate has time to give me an opportunity to be heard on this subject as I am in a hurry; but I do not wish to be heard now. I propose that this subject be deferred, and made the special order for to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a special order for to-morrow.

Mr. MASON. I understood that bill was up and is postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Until to-morrow.

Mr. MASON. It will come up as the unfinished business, I presume.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senate should adjourn in the present stage.

Mr. WIGFALL. I ask if there is any motion to take these documents private.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was part of my motion.

Mr. WIGFALL. Then I understand this bill does not lose its precedence by an adjournment.

On motion of Mr. POWELL, the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 7, 1860.

The House met at twelve o'clock, p. m. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to submit the following resolution, which is one merely calling for information from a Department.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows: Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to communicate to this House, estimates of the means necessary to complete the capital and the penitentiaries in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. GROW. I ask the gentleman that he will allow his resolution also to call upon the Department for information in reference to the public buildings in all the Territories.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask that my resolution be adopted. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can report from his Committee on Territories in reference to the other Territories. The buildings referred to in my resolution have been commenced and are now progressing toward their completion.

Mr. GROW. So are the public buildings in the other Territories.

Mr. PHELPS. Let the gentleman, then, submit a separate resolution, providing for the other Territories. I will not object to its adoption.

Mr. GROW. I have always had the misfortune, when I have submitted a resolution calling for information, to have objection made from the other side.

Mr. PHELPS. I will not object; and I will help the gentleman to have his resolution adopted.

Mr. GROW. If the gentleman will allow me, I will move my proposition as an amendment to his resolution.

Mr. HOUTSON. If the resolution is amended, I will object.

Mr. PHELPS. I decline to accept the amendment.

The resolution was adopted.

EXEMPLIFICATION OF LAND OFFICE PAPERS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was absent the other day when the States were called for bills, and I now ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce and have referred two bills.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN, previous notice having been given, introduced a bill to provide for the granting and exemplification of records and papers remaining in the General Land Office; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

INDIANA UNIVERSITY.

Mr. HOLMAN, previous notice having been given, also introduced a bill to authorize the State of Indiana to appropriate the lands granted to that State by Congress, for the use of a seminary of learning, and for the endowment of the Indiana University, and the proceeds thereof to any other educational purposes, in the discretion of the State; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BRANCH MINT AT CHICAGO.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce the following resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an assayer and branch mint at Chicago, Illinois; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

There was no objection.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce. Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. That is not a proper reference for that resolution. I move that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The question was taken; and the resolution was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

HOUSE DEBATES.

Mr. CASE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. It will be read for information.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee heretofore appointed on the revision of the rules, be instructed to inquire into, and report upon, the expediency of so amending the standing rules of this House, as to prohibit the publication in the official reports, of any remarks of members made out of order, or violation of the rules of this body.

Mr. HOUSTON. That select committee has made its report, and it is no longer in existence. Mr. NOELL. I object to the resolution, for, sir, I think we have law enough here already.

Mr. CASE. I give notice, then, that when the report of the committee comes up for action, I shall move the resolution just read, as an amendment. I think, sir, that it ought to be adopted.

SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LANDS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce a bill concerning certain swamp and overflowed lands in the State of Illinois. Previous notice has been given. I want it to go to the Committee on Public Lands.

There was no objection, and the bill was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WRONGLY REFERRED.

Mr. BRIGGS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to report back, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, certain papers wrongly referred to that committee.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported the following papers; which were laid upon the table:

The petition of John Winslow and others for a private act in the settlement of revolutionary claims of her husband; The memorial of Wallace Estell; and The memorial of Mary Balloch of Georgia.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports.

EXCUSED FROM SERVING ON A COMMITTEE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. I discover, from the publication of the committee of this House, made during my absence from the city, that I am placed as a member of the Committee on Naval Expenditures. It is not my purpose to complain that I was appointed on that committee; for I would as soon serve on that as on any other committee of this House. I understand that that committee has not met for four years, but that probably it will meet during this session. At the last session of Congress a special committee was raised to investigate the expenditures of the Navy Department at the Brooklyn and Philadelphia navy-yards into certain live-oak purchases, and into other matters connected with the administration of the Navy Department. Upon that committee were Mr. SIZEMAN, of Ohio; Mr. BOECK, of Virginia; Mr. GROEBECK, of Ohio; Mr. KITCHIE, of Pennsylvania; and Mr. READY, of Tennessee. Mr. SIZEMAN and Mr. BOECK are the only two members of this House who were upon that select committee. It investigated various matters, and made a report embodying something like one thousand printed pages of testimony.

Mr. SHERMAN has introduced that same subject into this Congress, and it has been referred to that committee. Mr. SHERMAN is on the Committee on Naval Expenditures. It is a very unusual thing to appoint the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means upon another standing committee. Mr. BOECK is the only other member of the present Congress who was upon that committee. You, Mr. Speaker, were not a member of the last Congress, and consequently did not know how the former committee was constituted, nor whether this subject would be referred to this particular committee during this session of Congress. As an act of justice to the country, as an act of justice to this House, as an act of justice to a high officer of the Government, I ask to be excused from service upon that committee, and that Mr. BOECK, of Virginia, be appointed in my place.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was excused.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. BOECK upon the committee, in the place of Mr. UNDERWOOD.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKY, its Chief Clerk, informing the House that a message had been received at 11. No. 2161 making appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Ponca Indians, and with certain bands of Indians in the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington, for the year ending June 30, 1860, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

LANDS TO ACTUAL SETTLERS.

Mr. THAYER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 22) to prevent the sale of the public lands, except to actual settlers, for ten years after the same shall have been surveyed; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

ASSIGNEES OF LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. THAYER, from the same committee, also reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, an act (S. No. 197) in relation to the assignees of bounty land warrants; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

LANDS FOR AGRICULTURAL PURPOSES, ETC.

Mr. THAYER, from the same committee, also reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (No. 6) donating public lands to the several States which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the House to postpone the consideration of that bill until the third Tuesday of April, and that in the mean time it be printed.

Mr. BRANCH. I move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon that question I call the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. I have not yielded the floor. Mr. BRANCH. I beg the gentleman's pardon, if he has not relinquished the floor. I thought he had.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not desire to consume unnecessarily the time of the House on this subject. When the bill was passed at the last session of Congress, complaint was made that it was passed through this body without discussion. I wish the bill printed, that gentlemen may read it, and I desire its consideration postponed in order that gentlemen may have a fair chance to discuss it, and dispose of it.

As I said before, I do not desire to consume any time upon it now, or hereafter; and I simply make the motion that its consideration be postponed until the third Tuesday of April, and that it be printed; and upon that motion I call the previous question.

Mr. BRANCH. The object I have in view is precisely such as that which the gentleman from Vermont says he has in view—to have a full and complete discussion of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I raised the previous question. Mr. BRANCH. I believe I was recognized before the gentleman called the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Vermont yield the floor? Mr. MORRILL. I do.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from North Carolina is entitled to it.

Mr. BRANCH. This bill is one of vast importance to the interests of the country, not only for the amount of public property which is proposed to be donated for the purposes specified, but for the principle involved. I do not desire to see a bill of the importance which attaches to this pass through this House after the ship and spur of the previous question, or after the new law. It is right that the bill should be discussed, and I am pleased to hear the gentleman from Vermont say that his object is to permit a discussion of the bill. If the motion to postpone succeed, we will know perfectly well that when the day arrives to which the bill is postponed, all the gentleman has to do is to rise and call the previous question upon the bill, and it will be put upon its passage without discussion or an opportunity for amendment.

If this bill is similar to the one reported at the last Congress by the gentleman from Vermont, there are important amendments I wish to offer to it, in order to make it just to the Old States of this Union. There are provisions in it that are grossly unjust to all but the New States. Wherever it is taken up for consideration, I desire an opportunity to propose amendments to it which shall remove those unjust provisions.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say to the gentleman that it is not my intention to move the previous question; but it is my purpose to do so before I rise. I said I would do so after a fair chance in this House; nothing more, nothing less.

Mr. BRANCH. We all know that our rules were framed to provide for the reference of bills to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; because experience and reason both have taught us that so far discussion and perfection of a measure can be made in the House; that the only way any measure can receive full and fair discussion and perfection by amendment is under the freedom which exists in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Nor can I see why the friends of this measure should object to its going to that committee. It is a great mistake, which has grown up in the House, to suppose that the sending a bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is equivalent to its being lost. A majority of this House can reach any bill that stands upon our Calendar in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. All that a gentleman has to do in that committee, when he wishes his bill taken up, is to move to pass over the bill before us upon the Calendar. Then a majority of the House has full and absolute control over it, not only to amend it, but to bring it into the House, whenever they think it is sufficiently discussed and amended. My object in desiring it to go to that committee is none other than I indicate that we may have a full opportunity to discuss its details, the great principles involved in it, and to amend it so as to make it more perfect. And in particular, as I before informed the gentleman from Vermont, my object is to amend it so that it shall be made to conform to what it professes to be—a bill to do equal and exact justice between all the States of this Union, the Old States as well as the new.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman from North Carolina allow me?

Mr. BRANCH. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. I make this proposition to the gentleman from North Carolina: to allow the bill to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and let me enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BRANCH. Ah, Mr. Speaker, that would not put the bill in a different position, in any respect, from that which it occupies to-day. The motion to reconsider is a privileged motion, and the gentleman from Vermont could call it up whenever it might be his pleasure to do so, and thus bring the bill into the House in precisely the same position in which it now is.

More than that, Mr. Speaker. After the gentleman had entered his motion to reconsider, the bill could not be taken up and discussed in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union until that motion was withdrawn, or otherwise disposed of, so that we would not have advanced one single step in referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, if at the same time the gentleman from Vermont were to enter his motion to reconsider. The gentleman from Vermont will understand that his motion to reconsider would prevent the bill from going to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union until the motion was disposed of. The only way in which we can discuss the bill and have an opportunity of perfecting it by amendments is, by sending it absolutely to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

This bill purports to donate lands to the several States for agricultural purposes. Now, I am curious to know—and we can only ascertain by a discussion of the bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—whether the gentleman propose to get the lands to comply with the requirements of the bill, if they should pass their honested bill? The vote that was taken here yesterday indicates very clearly that this House, at least, intends to pass a homestead law, and by a sufficient majority to set at defiance the veto of the President, if the President should think fit to veto it. When that homestead law is passed, where are we to get the lands with which to build these agricultural colonies? The friends of this bill, I am sure, very generally know the source of the homestead bill. I would like to explain this to us; I want them to prove it to us; and it can only be explained and proved in free discussion in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. How are they going to give lands to the States and to the military colleges, when they have already passed, or are about to pass, a bill to give all the lands that the Government owns to whomever will go and take possession, whether he be an American citizen or a foreigner freshly landed on our shores? That is one of the points which I wish to have discussed in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in regard to this bill. That is precisely the object of my motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—as is to give gentlemen a chance to show us where they are to get the lands with which to build agricultural colonies, if they give away all the lands to actual settlers. I now make my motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be whether the motion to postpone, submitted by the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. BRANCH. Do I understand the Chair to say that the motion to postpone will take precedence of my motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is not in order while the motion to postpone is pending. It will be in order afterwards.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to know what was the recommendation of the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. That the bill do not pass. Mr. PHELPS. Then, I suppose, the proper motion would be to lay the bill on the table. I submit that motion.

The SPEAKER. I understand that that was the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COBB. If so, how, then, has this debate been got up?

The SPEAKER. It was a mere recommendation. The motion to lay on the table has been made by the gentleman from Missouri. The motion is in order and is not debatable.

Mr. COBB addressed the Speaker.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to withdraw his motion for a single moment.

Mr. PHELPS. I will.

Mr. COBB. I have got the floor; but I will not occupy it more than three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri withdraw his motion to lay on the table?

Mr. PHELPS. I withdraw my motion to lay on the table, for this reason: The gentleman from Vermont, I believe, has introduced this bill, and had it referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I knew it, at all events, to have been a favorite subject of the gentleman from Vermont, and I introduced it in the last Congress; and I am willing to afford to the gentleman from Vermont an opportunity to make suggestions in regard to his bill; and then afford the same opportunity to the gentleman from

Mr. COBB. I have the floor, I believe.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COBB. After the gentleman from Missouri has withdrawn his motion to lay on the table, he cannot transfer the floor from me. I am a member of the Committee on Public Lands. That committee has directed its chairman to make an adverse report on this bill. A similar report was made by the committee the last Congress. At that Congress, only two members of the Committee on Public Lands favored the bill. The bill came into the House. It was taken up and discussed; and it occupied so much time that the gentleman from Missouri was not permitted to make some most important reports which it had to present. I call the attention of the House to this fact. If this thing goes on now, we will have the year and nays on the question of referring it, and the Committee on Public Lands will have no time to present their other reports, so as to let the other committees of the House make their reports. It is, therefore, the duty of all who feel an interest in having the reports of the Committee on Public Lands made, to endeavor to get this matter into such a form as to enable that committee to go and report to-day.

Now, I make this suggestion to the gentleman from Vermont. Let me make that the bill be recommended to the Committee on Public Lands. And let the gentleman from Vermont say that he is satisfied with the lands now vested in him, and sent from Mr. MORRILL. Ah! the gentleman shakes his head. He will not. Then I shall make the motion, and call on the House to sustain it. I do not make the motion with a view to defeat the gentleman's bill; because, if it be recommended to the Committee on Public Lands, that committee will probably be called before the day that the gentleman proposes to have it made a special order. The question is now before the House and the country, and every member of the House, and the citizens of every country, can, in the morning, investigate the merits of the bill. When it is again reported back by the Committee on Public Lands, whether adversely or favorably, the gentleman from Vermont can take such action upon it as he may deem proper. The Committee on Public Lands has not yet made its report, and it is left to the gentleman from Vermont to make his report, and to make his country interested; and I therefore request the gentleman from Vermont, and the House, to let this bill be recommended. That will not, as I said before, have the bill lost, because, if the gentleman himself to have it postponed to a period, subsequent, in all probability, to the time when the Committee on Public Lands will be again called.

The measure is not particularly a favorite with me; but still I do not want to put it in any worse position than the gentleman from Vermont proposes. All that I desire is, that the matter shall not prevent us to-day from making reports that are to result in benefit to the country.

The gentleman from Vermont can accomplish the object that he has in view by accepting my proposition, letting the bill be referred back to the Committee on Public Lands, and letting that committee report it back again. I hope the gentleman from Vermont will consent to this, and permit the Committee on Public Lands to report their measures, in which the whole country is concerned.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not purpose, Mr. Speaker, to consume more than a few minutes of the time of the House. This is a bill which occupied a considerable time of the last House, and which passed both the House and the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled a bill for the relief of William B. Herrick; which the Speaker signed the same.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES—AGAIN.

Mr. MORRILL. I deem this bill one of the most important that will come before us for some time. The proposition which I made was not to make it a special order. I would much prefer to make it a special order, but I know how objectionable special orders are to gentlemen upon all sides of the House, and I merely asked to postpone it to a day certain, in order that we might ified the General Land Office that the mails have been carried in accordance with that contract?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir; the parties must satisfy the Post Office Department that they have complied with all contracts.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE AT BOME, GEORGIA.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill simply for reference.

There being no objection, Mr. UNDERWOOD introduced a bill appropriating $10,000 for the construction of a post office at Bome, Georgia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

JOHN V. DOBRYN.

Mr. WINSLOW. As I am unexpectedly compelled to go home, I ask the indulgence of the House, to introduce a bill merely for reference.

There being no objection, Mr. WINSLOW introduced a bill for the relief of John V. Dobryn, a purser in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

TEXAS COURT-HOUSE.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask the same indulgence of the House. I have been unavoidably absent from the House for some days from sickness. I ask consent to introduce a bill for reference.

There being no objection, Mr. HAMILTON introduced a bill making an appropriation for the erection of court-houses for the United States district courts in the cities of Austin and Tyler, in the State of Texas; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SURVEY OF CHERMERE ISLAND.

Mr. LANDRUM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill recognizing the survey of Chermere Island, in the State of Louisiana, as approved by the surveyor general, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LOUISIANA SWAMP LANDS.

Mr. LANDRUM also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill supplemental to an act entitled "An act to aid the State of Louisiana in draining the swamp lands therein," which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REMOVAL OF THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. ALDRICH asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and hereby are, instructed to inquire into the expediency of removing the capital of this nation to some point on the Mississippi river, not between the falls of St. Anthony and the city of St. Louis, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CLEMENS and others objected.

NEBRASKA RAILROAD ACT.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported the House bill No. 210, granting lands to the Territory of Nebraska for the construction of certain railroads therein.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. This bill is reported back with an amendment. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider it. The committee on Public Lands, and that it be printed.

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. As the morning hour is out, I move to go to the business on the Speaker's table. The bill just reported by the gentleman from Indiana, of course every gentleman will examine.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order, and is received.

UNITED STATES AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to report from the Committee for the District of Columbia, a bill incorporating the United States Agricultural Society.

Mr. COBB. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. There is no objection, and the gentleman will submit his report.

Mr. BURNETT. I report the bill I have introduced, and I ask that it be put on its passage. It is nothing more than a simple act of incorporation. My reason for making the request that it be now passed is, that I understand the proposed incorporators have a promise, in case the society is organized and incorporated, of a deed to a lot in this city upon which to erect a suitable building for agricultural exhibitions.

Mr. MCCLERNAND. Is the society open for the United States?

Mr. BURNETT. It is a mere act of incorporation confining the action of this Agricultural Society in and to the District of Columbia, and no more.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title; and the bill was then read in extenso.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I am perhaps as much opposed to acts of incorporation as any gentleman upon this floor; and when they are granted, I am for guarding them strictly and rigidly. This is a simple act of incorporation. It merely authorizes the incorporation of an Agricultural Society for the District of Columbia. It extends no further. The bill, as read, authorizes them to sue and be sued within the District of Columbia "and elsewhere." Those words, "and elsewhere," the committee reported should be stricken out, and I thought they had been stricken out.

I hope the bill will now be passed, for the reason I have already stated. If any gentleman is unwilling that it should be passed at this time, and desires a postponement, giving a reason why it should not be acted on at once, I will unhesitatingly yield for a motion to postpone.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BURNETT. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORRIS of Illinois. I object to putting the bill upon its passage.

Mr. FLORENCE. It is bad enough to have acts of incorporation introduced here, without having them put upon their passage under the operation of the previous question. I have no particular objection to the bill; but it would authorize an opportunity of examining it. I would ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether it includes a rigid liability clause? Unless it does, I certainly will not vote for it; I will vote for no act of incorporation that does not contain that clause.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BURNETT. That motion is not now in order. To meet the views of gentlemen, I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and ask that a motion to reconsider be entered.

Mr. FLORENCE. That is right. I do not object to that.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is entered.

Mr. BURNETT. I move that the bill and report be printed, and the motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill providing for an additional term of the United States circuit and district courts in the State of Kentucky. Previous notice has been given.

There was no objection; and the bill was received, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. STOUT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce a bill for the construction of a railroad from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean.

There was no objection; and the bill was received, and read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. STOUT. I move that the bill be referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad question, to which committee other bills for a Pacific railroad have been referred.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

VISIT TO MOUNT VERNON.

Mr. FLORENCE. Yesterday we accepted the invitation of the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association to visit Mount Vernon to-day, and I move that the House do now adjourn, in order that we may execute that acceptance practically.

Mr. BRANCH. Let there be a general understanding that no business shall be done to-day, and then those who wish to make speeches can do so, and those who wish to go with the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association to Mount Vernon, can do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us get through with the introduction and reference of some bills first.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will waive my motion to adjourn for a moment or two.

CUSTOM-HOUSE OATHS.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing custom-house oaths, and of substituting declarations in lieu thereof, with proper penalties for breach of the same.

There was no objection; and the resolution was then adopted.

LEWIS W. CHATFIELD.

Mr. HELMICK, by unanimous consent, previous notice having been given, introduced a bill for the relief of Lewis W. Chatfield; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

NANCY BUKY.

Mr. HELMICK, by unanimous consent, previous notice having been given, also introduced a bill for the relief of Nancy Buky; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

JACOB AMMON.

Mr. HELMICK, by unanimous consent, previous notice having been given, also introduced a bill for the relief of Jacob Ammon; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

JOHN JACKSON.

Mr. HELMICK, by unanimous consent, previous notice having been given, also introduced a bill granting a pension to John Jackson, an invalid soldier; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ALEXANDER CROSS.

Mr. TOMPKINS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that it report of the Court of Claims on the petition of Alexander Cross be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

EXTENSION OF THE PORT OF NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. TAYLOR, by unanimous consent, previous notice having been given, introduced a bill to extend the port of entry of New Orleans, so as to include the city of Jefferson, in the State of Louisiana; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RAYOU LA FOUCHE.

Mr. TAYLOR, by unanimous consent, previous notice having been given, also introduced a bill to remove the obstructions in the bayou La Fouché, in the State of Louisiana; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I move, then, that we proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. SHERMAN. If objection is made to getting through with this little business of introducing bills for reference, I move, then, that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of thing which would have a tendency to retard their settlement or diminish their value; and, as the entire history of the world shows, and our own country establishes, that slavery is a mildew and blight, that Congress should keep free territory free during its territorial condition, unless for any cause it delegates such power to be exercised by the people therein.

I believe that slavery is a local institution, existing entirely and exclusively by virtue of the law of the State which creates it, not recognized as such beyond the State limits only so far as the Constitution of the United States regards the right of each State to retake, and the obligation of sister States to return, fugitives from justice or labor.

Such, sir, is the platform of the Republican party. Does it not contain the recorded principles of the Democratic party, and of all parties, from the adoption of the Constitution down to 1847?

Listen to a resolution of the gallant State of Georgia, whose entire delegation on this floor and in the Senate make loud and valorous boasts that no man elected on the Republican platform shall ever be inaugurated President. On the 12th day of January, 1775, she said:

"To show the world that we are not influenced by any interested or contracted motives, but a general philanthropy for all mankind, of whatever language or complexion we hereby declare our disapprobation of the practice of the unnatural practice of slavery in America—a practice founded in injustice and equity, and highly dangerous to our liberties, habits and to our fellow-creatures below men, and corrupting the virtue and morals of the rest, and violating the balance of liberty we contend for upon a very wrong foundation. We therefore demand: that laws to enforce our solemn endeavors for the transmission of our slaves into this colony, upon the most humane and equitable footing for the masters and themselves."

Men of Georgia, go by the graves of your fathers, renew your love of country, and recall your treasonable designs. The serious charges you make against us last week are the testimonies of your ancestors. We stand this day on the Georgia resolutions of 1775. Such were the sentiments of all the patriots of the Revolution. Under their influence, your fathers—I mean your liberty-loving fathers, for I suspect the traitors of Georgia did not, even in that day, subscribe to the above resolutions—aided to achieve the freedom of our country. The desire of universal liberty warmed the heart of the American soldier; and in the hopes of final establishment and full fruition, he sacrificed property and life. By men breathing such sentiments, the Constitution and Union were established; and now you say that the mere enunciation of the same principles must produce dissolution, anarchy, and a reign of terror.

Washington said, in 1786:

"It being among my first wishes to see every man subdued by which slavery in this country may be abolished by law."

Franklin, who lent the powers of a great soul to achieve our independence, and then brought the wisdom of a great mind to aid in constructing a Constitution, became, almost immediately after its adoption, president of an abolition society.

Madison said:

"We have seen more distinction of color made, in the most enlightened period of any age, than in the most oppressive dominion ever exercised by man over man."

Mr. Henry said:

"I deplore slavery with all the pity of humanity; I reprobate again, it wounds my soul, and that every one of my fellow-beings was emancipated."

Mr. Jefferson said:

"And with what execration should the stemmen be loaded who, permitting one half of the citizens thus to trample on the rights of the other, transmit their inheritance and three times ten millions. I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just; that His justice cannot sleep forever. No feeling so strong as that which the book of fate, thus that these people are to be free. What a stupendous task! What a tremendous material man, who can endure toil, hunger, stripes, imprisonment, and death itself, in vindication of his own liberty, and the most inhuman to all states of man, who has ever been supported him through his trials, and inflict on his fellow-men a bondage, one hour of which is fraught with more misery than ages of that which is termed freedom possess? When the measure of their tears shall be full; when their groans shall have lowered heaven in darkness, and when a God of justice will awake, and their oppressor, by diffusing light and liberty among their oppressors, shall at length be made to feel that he is unworthy. His attention to the things of this world, and that they are not left to the guidance of a blind fate."

Here you now, believe these sentiments? Would you suffer a press in the southern States to publish them? Would you allow a man, except under pain of death, to read them in the ears of your slaves? And must I be expatriated and dishonored because I merely echo them? Sir, these principles were born in the shock of the Revolution, and were inspired in the blood of your fathers and mine on the battle-fields of the North and the South. In the light of an universal sentiment of universal liberty among the patriot framers of the Constitution, will you say that the Declaration of Independence is but a glittering generality? When the pillars of the Republic shall have crumbled in the dust; when her liberties shall have been sacked and burned; when a free press and free speech shall be dragged, as Hector, at the chariot wheels of a slave oligarchy; when the rights of the millions of wretched fellow-creatures of the Revolution shall be forgotten by an unworthy posterity; then tell them that the great bill of rights for all mankind was but a glittering generality. No, sir, our fathers threw it out, not as a wandering comet, or dazzle for a moment by its brilliant coruscations, but as a sun, far above the mists and exhalations of avarice and power, to shine upon and for all, to the remotest generations.

Our sentiments were repeated by your grandmen in Virginia in 1802, shortly after the slave insurrection at Southampton, when over sixty of your white persons were slain. They were then in convention dispensing the question of emancipation, and when all the horrors of a servile war had been perpetrated, and the country was exposed to remedy the evil, not by the penitentiary and gallows, but by applying the principle of universal liberty. Such were the opinions of Moore, Rives, Powell, Preston, Randolph, Marshall, and a host of others.

McDowell said:

"You may close upon his mind every avenue to knowledge and flood it over with artificial night—yoke him to the mill, and make him toil for his food, and yet he was born to be free will survive it; it is said to his hope of immortality; it is the rational part of the nature which cannot reach; it is a moral truth; it is a law of the hand of the Deity, and never meant to be extinguished by the hand of man. If gentlemen do not see or feel this, they will be unable to see the truth, and they will see and feel that it is gone. We cannot correct this, we can only see the current of error."

Among those who have in the hope to see Charles J. Faulkner, who lately has avowed so much of disunion, and been duly rewarded by an appointment at the hands of this slavery-controlled Administration. The disunionist Faulkner is worthy of such an appointment; while the disunionist Phillips and Garrison would only merit stripes and imprisonment. Disunion for slavery or for freedom are quite different things. Mr. Faulkner, on the 20th day of January, 1832, speaking of emancipation, said:

"I shall recoil at among the proudest instances of my life, that I have contributed my feeble aid in forward a revolution to grand and patriotic in its results. The people demand I have raised my voice for emancipation. Sir, tax this grade; vilify our country; carry the sword of extermination through our own desolate villages; but spare no pains to open the eyes of the slave, his interest drop from the chalice of the destroying angel."

This he said while the soil of Virginia was yet moist with the blood of his murdered countrymen. He further added:

"Slaves are held not by any law of nature; not by any paternalism from God. Sir, I am grateful to gentlemen who yet rise in this hall the avowed advocates of slavery. The day has gone by when such a voice could be listened to with patience or tolerance."

Men of Virginia, can you believe that such opinions were uttered in the Old Dominion near thirty years ago? Now take down Helper; place them side by side, and determine which is the more rational and more judicious. Will you read "oughts" while such sentiments are slumbering in the debates and archives of your Commonwealth? Get some country squire to pronounce judgment, and commit them to the flames. I solemnly declare of nearly all your States that slavery was merely a right existing by positive law of a municipal character, without foundation in the law of nature.

Congress, guided by the prevailing sentiment of the nation, exercised its power over free territory by a compact of non-interference. This was the universal action of Congress unless it was restrained by the act of purchase or cession. In the territory ceded to the General Government by the Carolinas and Georgia, those States, in ceding, expressly did so on the condition that Congress should not prohibit slavery therein. Those States, which had but recently been discussing the national Constitution, were presumed to be well informed as to its spirit and provisions; and the mere fact of their resistance to Congress is an acknowledgment on their part that Congress does have the right to exercise the power, and they desired to guard against it. When Louisiana was purchased, Napoleon, in the treaty of sale, provided that the rights of the inhabitants should be protected, and one of the rights then existing was slave labor. Congress, however, did interfere, and exercise a power over the Territories, by prohibiting the foreign and domestic slave trade.

From the ordinance of 1787, prohibiting slavery in the new States, Congress, in Ohio, dated in 1848, Congress, on eighteen different occasions, and during each Democratic Administration, did, without interruption or rebuke, exercise the power of governing the Territories, furnishing their officers, and retaining a negative or approval upon the acts of respective Territorial Legislatures. In the case of Florida, Congress, five times, between 1823 and 1838, approved of, and eleven times, during the same period, amended, the laws of her Territory.

The people will not, if gentlemen on this floor dare, impugn the Democracy of Jackson. During his administration, in 1836, a law was passed declaring "that no act of the Territorial Legislature incorporating a militia or militia company, liable to be put into the field, shall have any force or effect until approved or confirmed by Congress." Twice did Jackson arrest the Legislatures of Wisconsin and Florida in violation of this law. This power was questioned in 1839, when Mr. Monroe (and still his Cabinet, with possibly the exception of Mr. Calhoun, a majority of whom were slaveholders) and his Democratic Administration acknowledged the right, and approved its exercise.

Even in 1840, Mr. Polk signed, and a Democratic Administration approved, a law, in which slavery was prohibited. It is said Mr. Polk approved the bill because the Territory lay north of 36° 30'. That does not weaken the force of the argument that he recognized the existence of the right of Congress to legislate on the line of 36° 30', by its very terms, only extended to the Louisiana purchase, and could not be applied to any other Territory, unless especially enacted. It did not reach west of the Rocky Mountains, and was not extended to the Pacific line, in 1847-48, should be extended to the Pacific the very fact that they urged an extension of the line by Congress, is an irresistible argument that they believed Congress had the power so to extend it. They claimed a tax, in the spirit of the legislation of 1820, the line should be extended to the Pacific. They did not question the power of Congress so long as they hoped to control its exercise. Hence, there was no possible restraint on Mr. Polk from voting the Oregon bill, had he or his party believed Congress possessed so much power. Polk had only to restrain legislation, not to undo, but to keep from doing, in order to save the Constitution.

In 1853, the Democratic party believed, or professed to believe, that Congress had so much power, and it had no hesitation in destroying the work of the fathers. By way of pseudo, allow me to add that Mr. Buchanan, at Lancaster, November 25, 1859, offered a resolution that the Representatives in Congress pass and such power. He requested to use their utmost end-avances, as members of the national Legislature, to prevent the extension of slavery in any of the Territories or States which may be created by Congress." Does Mr. Buchanan suppose that the Democratic party took a step further in itself of freedom than the Republicans on this floor? Was Mr. Buchanan a murderer and traitor in 1819?

In 1840 and 1828, the Supreme Court of the United States recognized and affirmed this power of Congress under the Constitution.

Such is the uniform and consistent historical, legislative, and judicial history of this subject down to 1848. At that time the fruitful valleys and rich mines of California aroused the lust of avarice and desire for more of the bread of the slaveholders. They sought a market on the Pacific coast for their human merchandise, and were avaricious for the control of that princely domain; and they knew their only way was through and over the well-defined legislation of our country.

in my devotion to the laws and judicial decisions; but I claim the right to seek the repeal of an unjust law, or the reversal of a decision which shocks the humanity of the nation. This very hour, Virginia is waging an irrepressible conflict in the court of appeals, in the State of New York, to nullify one of the humane laws of that State, so that slavery may be allowed the right, in the State of New York, to roam throughout the Union. And when Virginia, as she undoubtedly will, notwithstanding her clamor for State rights, carries the Lemmon case to the Supreme Court of the United States, that court will sustain Virginia, and then all the States will be bound to do so. A unanimous decision, we could not propose armed or factious resistance. We would cry it; but, at the same time, we would indulge the hope that the awakening of the public mind, the arousing of a righteous indignation, would send some rays of light down into the subterranean vaults from whence Dred Scott decisions emanate; that the conscience and judgment of the court would see the folly and wickedness, and reverse its own decisions.

We will obey the law, to be wrong; but when we feel and believe it to be wrong, we must be allowed the effort to make it right.

The records of the world show that the last and most insidious attacks made on the rights of the people have come through the judiciary. How often has "man looked for judgment and behold oppression." The history of England is full of admonition. We cannot forget the Star Chamber and the High Commission; with what avidity English judges were ready to obey the behests of English monarchs, whether to confiscate property or to sacrifice life. The Divine right of kings received judicial acknowledgment from the judges of Charles I., and the right of Parliament to tax the American colonies was protected by the bench. What faith now are the followers of the Democratic party called upon to profess? Said Mr. Cass, a few days since, in the Senate Chamber:

"I claim the Democratic party was purer and better than it is. I am afraid it is becoming itself, if not corrupt, if least corruptible."

On another occasion:

"But I believe that the greater portion of the northern Democratic party—those who belong to that organization in the States—are to-day as true as the Black Republicans."

Corrupt, rotten—expressive adjectives. I make no such charges; but a dignified, venerable, gray-headed Democratic Senator thus solemnly arraigns the northern Democracy. At a later day, to point his former speeches, he adds:

"The large portion, if not the whole, of the northern Democracy are unscrupulous. I mean on the question of territorial rights; their position is as false as the rights of the southern States as the Wilmot proviso itself."

It is for me to Nothing extensive,

Nor set down ought in salience."

I only desire the Democracy to see to what indignities they must be subjected, if they manifest any unwillingness to bow down and worship this black Juggernaut of slavery. Cassand, rotten, corrupt! To show that slavery is repugnant to the Constitution, to the Democratic party, to control the Democratic party, is in now molding its destinies, only notice that Mr. Buchanan, in his late message, says:

"I cordially congratulate you upon the final settlement, by the Supreme Court of the United States, of the question of slavery in the Territories. The right has been established of any citizen to take his property, of any kind, including slaves, equally to all the States of the Confederacy, and to have it protected there under the Federal Constitution. Neither Congress nor a Territorial Legislature has the power, has any authority to annul or impair this vested right."

I ask the Democratic party, where now is your popular sovereignty? Where the right of the people of the Territories? Where the rights of that portion who were leaders of the radical Barnburners? What a record will stare them in the face! Free-Soilers in 1848, popular sovereignty men in 1856, deniers of both in 1860.

When did you, gentlemen, first incorporate this dogma in your creed? Did you ever try to take you begged from Congress the privilege to retake your slaves in the Territories? Did you believe it in 1854-55-56, when, at the sacrifice of much money and blood, you were determined to force slavery into Kansas? If the people in that Territory had no right to exclude slavery, you would never have waged so cruel and unnatural a warfare. Why did you struggle, if the Constitution gave you all you could obtain after a hard-fought victory? No, gentlemen, you never believed it; not for one moment. It was not until defeated you in the face in Kansas, that you sought to arm yourselves with a law and doubtful reasoning.

Within a few weeks the Legislature of Nebraska, by a law, prohibited slavery therein; and the willing tool of this Administration vetoed the bill. The people of that Territory, now numbering some forty or fifty thousand, along with the rivers villages and cities are springing up as if by magic, whose prairies are teeming with the fruits of free and educated industry, are told that they cannot frame their domestic institutions, even to keeping back "the bitter water that causeth the curse."

Only a few days since the Legislature of Kansas enacted a law prohibiting slavery within the Territory, and another plain Administration-pro-slavery Executive vetoes the bill; and that people, who were assured by the Democratic party on this floor, a year ago, that they could assume the rights and position of a sovereign State, if they would only submit to a constitution recognizing human bondage, are now told that they have no inherent or delegated power to stop the tread of the slave. Yet would the Democratic party, what Democratic organs, even in the free States, dare rebuke the insolence and spurn the outrage? Possibly you may turn on us and say, why do we object, that we were opposed to the Nebraska bill? You told us, in 1854, that we must wage the war of the fact that the Missouri line; granted. Did that give you the right, when you wrenched all but that from us, to turn and steal that little also. And when, again, you drive us to the wall, and take all but the uncertain privilege of popular rights, and tell us we must wage the war of the fact of the Territory; and, while we protest that you leave us no little, must we quietly submit that you should finally come and depose us even of that?

It is due to truth to say that, in the circle of the Democratic family, on this subject there is an irrepressible conflict now waging; they differ about the meaning of the Constitution; quarrel about the Cincinnati platform, seeming to forget it was designed to have a northern as well as southern exposure; and have a furious contest as to what has been done by the Democratic party. This organization will allow no toleration of individual opinion on this slavery question. You may claim it, as did Galileo and Wickliffe, at the risk of the anathemas of a religious despotism. See the political executions of the last two years. No matter how humble the man, how unimportant his situation, if he suffered the least glimmer of anti-slavery sentiment he must be excluded from the pale of the party as a warning to all others that a like rebellion should merit and receive a like fate.

For a moment, and see the positions Democratic leaders must assume in waging this unholy war to extend slavery. Senator JEFFERSON Davis said, in Mississippi, in July last:

"Thus, for a long period ever scattered her seed broadcast in every corner of our confederate States. The recent free discussion by the press and on the forum have dispelled delusions which had shrouded the minds of a generation, that the only way out of it was more easy to find the apologist than the defender."

Alexander H. Stephens, the acknowledged leader of the Democracy on this floor during the last Congress, said in Georgia, in June last:

"Negro slavery is but in its infancy! It is a mere problem of our Government; our fathers did not understand it, and the people of the South were once obliged to find the apologist than the defender."

Negro slavery in its infancy! That fact must be consoling to those exceedingly pious gentlemen who are claiming for African slavery divine origin from the curse denounced against Canaan in the frantic rage of Noah's delirium. In its infancy! when gentlemen justify it because it has existed in all ages of the world. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KITT], on this floor, adds his testimony:

"The sentiments which the great mass of the Revolution entertained upon the question of slavery, are immaterial to me. The institution had not been discussed; its character and capacities had not been tested; besides, they were imposed with the influence of the French encyclopedists, and were affected by the abstractions of the Declaration of Independence."

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] said:

"The gentleman refers to the sentiments of distinguished revolutionary men, and asks me if I repudiate them. Sir, many of those sentiments, of course, I repudiate; many of those sentiments are false in philosophy and in fact."

As gentlemen daily pass through the rotunda or the galleries, and are asked to consider the magnificent painting representing their fathers in Congress signing this now vilified Declaration of Independence? Why, sir, since the world began, save the band of Apostles gathered with Christ at the last supper, never has there been conceived so grave, deliberate, and determined a body of men. When you are in the presence of the life-like representation of your patriot fathers, then there must come down a withering rebuke from the silent canvas reproving your ingratitude and infidelity, in stigmatizing the work and men whom they represent as abstractions, and the frenzies of French encyclopedists.

Sir, such imputes needs only the rebuke of silence. Where are the Danites who assassinate men if they are suspected of slandering the history of the South? Who are the cold-blooded slanderers of your history and the memory of your great men? Why not seize your canes, and clutch your knives, and drive such men from your borders?

Has it come to this—the solemn declaration of your fathers at all personalities and abstractions; their well-settled principles of freedom you stigmatize as delusions; their established policy and laws you rebuke under the insolent arrogance that the people men of the South "did not understand the system of negro slavery;" and that, in spite of the fact that for years they had been struggling against the despotism of royalty to suppress slavery and the slave trade?

You have a right to change your views and condemn your fathers. We have a right to pursue their policy and revere their memory. For this, you will reproach and proscribe, and deprive us of all participation in the administration of this Government; yet you cannot control us by threats of danger, or blameworthy of power. For us, "Is not the gleaming of the grapes of Ephraim better than the vintage of Judah?"

Do you ever reflect upon the treason of your insane threats? Said the member from South Carolina, [Mr. KITT]:

"The South will resist to the overthrow of the Government the ascendancy of the Republican party. Should the Republican party succeed at the next presidential election, my advice to the South is to map the cords of the Union at once and forever."

Said the member from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS]:

"The Black Republicans showed their organized rebellion when they presented Fremont as a sectional candidate for the Presidency, as a representative of their system of free labor in opposition to our system of slave labor. Against that rebellion we turned to arms. We mean to put it down, even if we have to do it with the bayonet. Gentlemen of the Republican party, I warn you: preserve your sense of honor, and do not, ever, hire a representative of your system of labor, and we of the South will tear the Constitution into pieces."

Sir, raise your brain, nerve your arm, precipitate the issue upon us, and we are ready. Our northern fathers were told by an English officer, "Disperse, ye rebels; throw down your arms, and disperse." Their answer, if necessary, shall be our answer.

He continued:

"I, I, now, have more affection for an Englishman than a Black Republican rebel."

Quite likely. Many of the men in the South, during the Revolution, experienced the same thrill of joy in loving a British red-coat, or a Hessian child-butcher, better than an American patriot or a colonial rebel.

You also threaten to dissolve the Union in case another demand is not complied with. The member from Georgia [Mr. CALHOUN] said:

"We have now four million slaves. In some twenty-five years hence we will have eight million. We demand emancipation. We will have emancipation, in spite of the Republican party."

The member from Mississippi [Mr. SHELTON] said:

"We have now four million slaves to Africa States; we will, in fifty years from now, have sixteen million. But I tell you the institution of slavery must be sustained. Yes, sir, we will expend this institution; we are not inclined to be coerced within our present limits; and there are not men enough in all your borders to coerce three million armed men in the South."

Have you, gentlemen, made any calculation where you will withdraw your nation, when you have withdrawn from the Union? Have you the madness and folly to believe that you could wrest it from the States who retain their allegiance to the Constitution and Government?

There is yet another plank in this modern Democratic platform. Mr. Kerry adds:

"It is also incontrovertible that all the inhabitants of a State cannot be educated; the ordinance of God condemns mankind to labor, and certain mental occupations are incompatible with mental cultivation."

Does the slaveholder impiously claim to be above mankind, so as to be beyond the reach of the ordinance of God? Are you so privileged and exalted an order that you are not required to yield allegiance to that ordinance? You insist man shall be kept under the curse of cursed Noah. By what right do you endeavor to avert from the ordinance, given by the Almighty himself: "in sorrow shalt thou eat of all the days of thy life; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground?" This explains the horrors of southern Democracy to free men, free labor, and free schools.

Freemen—laboring men of the North—and, if it be not reasonable, of the South, are you willing to add in extending into the common Territories a system whose corner-stone is the ignorance of the people, and which will establish the policy that labor "is incompatible with mental cultivation?" Must the honest-hearted laborer, as he reads the record of science, history, and government, in a free press, and around whose humble fireside, after the toil and sweat of the day, from the various sources of labor are poured out the treasures of all ages; and in the mind of his child, if there be a diamond, it will be developed by education, and finally shine in his country's history: is he to be told that mental cultivation is incompatible with labor?

And you now declare, in case this system of oppression and ignorance be not expanded, you will sever every tie that binds the Union. You may have counted the costs. Have you the vision of a seer, to reach far down through coming centuries, to see all the horrors that the American people will end in decades, centuries, or cycles. If you force dissolution upon us we can only hope—

"If it were done, when 'tis done, then 'twere well it were done quickly."

On this subject, how appropriate to-day is the language of Lewis Cass and Daniel S. Dickinson on the 1st day of March, 1847, in the Senate Chamber. Said the former, speaking of dissolution:

"That word has got to be quite a common one in our national vocabulary. It frightened me once; but I have now ascertained that the word became quite familiar, and does not inspire the least dread. I recognize it as an old acquaintance, changing from time to time its drapery, but retaining its identity. For example, the American people, will take care of us and the crisis, too, and they will still take care of the Union, and guard it from any foreign or domestic invasions."

The latter said:

"I have no gloomy forebodings over the dissolution of the Union; politicians need not dissolve it, if they would; it will dissolve itself, if it expand, it will contract, it will be said in the dust. Pillar after pillar shall strengthen and adorn the edifice, while others, the venerable and gray-headed are your fathers, shall occupy those seats, and those walls echo to their voice."

Why will you not, then, heed the counsel of the statesmen of the past and present? You profess much sympathy for the free laborers of the North, and brand them as white slaves. Take warning from your sympathy the free whites of the South, and unite with us to give them free homes in the West. Insist not upon your expansion theory, nor plant on that virgin soil a servitude which will disgrace them; for your own people feel more keenly than we, that—

"The badge of the slave is the stain of the free."

Charge not upon us the folly of your weakness. Easy, ye North. You possess the soil, and more than half the Union, to the exclusion of northern freemen; with a climate genial, to nurture the fruits of the tropics, and a soil rivaling that of the Nile in richness. Saving the blight of slavery, "among the smooth stones of the stream is thy portion;" while the North wrestles with the waterfall, digs into the mountains, struggles with the quarry, and cultivates, here and there, a fruitful valley. Be content to let slavery wear itself out on your own soil. You may suffer plagues and pestilence; you may harden your hearts, as did Pharaoh; but in God's own time He will bid you "let the people go;" and He will lead them to a land of rest.

You say the slave, in many cases, kisses the hand that smites him, and prefers his yoke to freedom. So did the Israelites, even when the Lord was their pillar of cloud by day and fire by night; for in the wilderness they hankered for the yokes and flesh-pots of Egypt. Ages of oppression will destroy the ability and inclination to resist.

"Prolonged endurance tames the bold."

Byron makes Bonivard, the brave prisoner of Chillon, to say:

"It was, at length, the same to me,

Freedom for prisoners as to be

I learned to love despair.

My very veins and I grew friends;

So much a long confinement tends

To make us what we are."

Gentlemen take about the brute force of majorities, and declare they will not submit. We are now told, "Dare you but exercise the right of freemen, in a clear and constitutional mode; elect for President your choice, and we will see the teachings of all parties down to 1848, and the dogs of war shall be let loose upon you." Already you are making appropriations of thousands to build arsenals, to purchase arms, and are now mustering forces, as you say, to threaten and coerce the North. You may limit no chain to the body of your slave; you may subject him to the lash and imprisonment; but when, in the insolence of long-enjoyed power, you seek to coerce individual opinion and political action by cruel threats, did we yield we would deserve to be slain.

"Must I give way and room to your rash choice?

Shall I be frightened when a madman starts?"

We meet you in unkindling spirit. We desire that no "son of man" should "prophecy against the freemen of the South field." We are glad that you are commencing to live on your own account; that is the true wealth of nations. We are gratified that you are wearing your own garments; it is true they look a little rough at present, but persevere. After the lapse of years, (probably not in your time, but your posterity will see it,) science will render you much aid. All arts are rude among a people which is just assuming independence of its neighbors.

You cannot expect the advantages of machinery, until some Yankees go down and explain the necessities of the use; for no chain to your great rage and passport system, the tyranny of travel is exceedingly irksome in your empire, especially to the Yankee who is at all fond of the free use of his limbs; so you will have to forego all advantages of machinery some longer. I see by our country papers, that when you are to make shoe pegs, then your brogans you will no longer import from the North; all you want now is toleration and industry to make you a great nation. This is well enough, but for your frightful gasconade, You declare that should a Republican President be elected, he never can be inaugurated in this Capitol. How will you prevent it? I judge from your military preparation you mean force. Where will you get your gunpowder? You make none south of Delaware. Where will you get your arms? South of New England, Dixon's line you manufacture none in all your borders. Can you retain it now by force? If so, you will do infinitely better than you did in 1814. The English, then, without any fear, could have crowned a king in your Capitol. They drove the English out of your own New England; and although you knew the design of the enemy was to invade and burn, you retreated, and stopped not to fire a gun in its defense.

I impugn not your courage, nor reflect upon your motives; but I hazard the opinion that, had the Capitol stood amidst the rocks of New England, or the rough hills of the North, five thousand of herocracy would have struck, and if necessary perished, in its defense. Since that time, some of your people have been very solicitous about the archives. You know Governor Wise, in 1856, had Fremont been elected President, was prepared to march with one hundred thousand men to the capital, and seize the archives. Some persons very wickedly suggested that it might be the Treasury he was after. Impossible! whoever alleged that a southern Democrat was actuated by mercenary motives? You say you will magnanimously withhold the aid if we will consent that the Constitution recognize property in man, and the corresponding right to take it into all the Territories of the Union. That we never can do, for our fathers never did, but guarded carefully against any such implication. Madison said: "he would not consent that the Constitution should recognize the idea of property in man."

In the Constitution the word "servitude" was stricken out, and the word "service" was inserted: the former being thought to express the condition of slaves, and the latter the obligations of free persons. The term "legally" was stricken out, because it was thought equivocal, and favoring the idea that slavery was legal in a moral view, and "under the laws thereof" substituted. Why, then, should we admit what our fathers never conceded? The Constitution recognizes the right of each State, and the obligations of sister States, to restore her fugitives, whether from service or justice; and as by this provision it did not pretend to designate what might or might not be crime, leaving that with each State, any State might make a new and additional enumeration of crimes, and have her rights respected under this provision. So the Constitution did not legalize and sanction existing forms of labor any further than protecting each State in her systems of labor, whatever they might be; and should new forms of labor be devised, and should any State be protected in the rendition provision, and the Constitution not be chargeable with the folly or wisdom of existing or new forms of labor.

The white men of the North are now excluded from fifteen slave States of the Union; they are driven from their homes, simply because they exercise the right of thought and speech. Such as South Carolina, Georgia, and Kentucky are, you sought to make California, Oregon, and Kansas. While you claim the right to carry into the territories your laws, you have simply taken the law which creates them, and the public opinion which sustains it, you deny to the men of the North the right to take what is dearer to them than property—their principles. You deny them the free use of the mails; you exercise a censorship of the press and incursion of individual thought, more revolting than a Russian despotism. Even here, in the calmness of deliberation, the distinguished gentleman from the noble State of Missouri, where the bonds of slavery are weakening and dissolving, where the steam engine is puffing the dark wave to the remote South, [Mr. ALEXANDER] said:

"Now predict that, unless a revolution shall take place in the public sentiment of the North, of which I have now no hope, your people will be driven from that section of the Union will be permitted to travel through the southern States, unless he brings with him evidence of conservative foreign institutions, and claims the people of the South and its domestic institutions."

These, sir, are the liberal principles of that party, which knows no North, no South, no West, no East, and is self-boarding in the virtues of a great nationality, and clamorous over the fact that Fremont had no electoral votes in the free States where just such intolerance as has been thundered in our ears dominates over all. Remove the despotism of opinion and anarchy of violence from your own people, and no successful judgment in your own States would rally thousands around the standard of free labor, free schools, and free soil. See the once proud State of Virginia laying her hands on the mails and authorizing some prejudiced justice to sit in judgment and condemn to the flames all publications that excite his ire. And this, beyond all things, shows the outrage and enormity of the system, which cannot be sustained, except upon the destruction of all those rights which should be the boast of a free people.

A few years ago a self-naturalized Hungarian was seized in Smyrna by Austria, and claimed as a criminal against her laws. This nation was aroused, and American cannon would have echoed along the classic shores of the Mediterranean, and American blood crimsoned her waters, had a hair of Martin Kosza's head been injured. Mr. Buchanan is begging for the Army and Navy to reduce the rights of American citizens in Mexico and Central America; yet here, within the States, upon the citizens thereof, outrages are committed which should mantle the cheeks of barbarism with shame, and no lamentation comes from the notorious Executive. This system of outrage, this reign of terror, you seek to extend over all the land.

You charge upon the North an occasional outbreak of disorder, for which the guilty are duly punished, while you, who would violate the laws of your State and the natural rights of the white man, condemning him without trial, and inflicting barbarous punishment without judicial judgment and sentence. Some men of South Carolina arrested a free white laborer, mobbed him in the streets of their city, subjected him to stripes at the hands of a slave; all in violation of the laws of the State. You may boast of your chivalry, but such men are dastards, whom it would be "base flattery to call cowards." The stranger lands in the cargo of merchandise from Africa, and you jurists refuse to punish the pirate. A few months ago, a woman with a sick child was driven from a village of Georgia, because she had written to her friends at the North her impressions about slavery. A whole community, the Bereans, were exiled from the soil of Kentucky for no crime; they were only obnoxious in entertaining the opinions proclaimed by Washington and Jefferson. Are such the men you propose arming to defend the Capitol and archives? Rest assured, braver men than they fled from the British in 1811.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman—
Mr. VAN WYCK. The gentleman must excuse me.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman has stated a fact—
Mr. VAN WYCK. The gentleman must excuse me.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand the gentleman to state as a fact, that a woman was driven from Georgia with a sick child, I desire to say that I never heard of it before; it is new to me; and I do not believe a word of it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The gentleman does not read the papers, then; he has to answer.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman give the authority for his assertion?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will furnish it some other time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then you have no authority with you.

Mr. BINGHAM. He says he has it not here.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Your despotism is as galling upon the whites as the shackles. Slavery must prescribe what books they shall read. Your population is about eight million; yet you control their destinies, and compel their opinions. How many men from the South on this floor are non-slaveholders? How many in the Senate, and among the foreign appointments? Your soil was invaded by Brown and a few followers, and Virginia is convulsed from center to circumference. In violation of all law, your citizens were shot down, and you had a right to feel outraged and indignant. Governor Wise heard the Virginia militia, the Federal Executive sent sixteen marines, who captured Brown; about the same number, I believe, Jackson sent, in 1832, to conquer South Carolina, and place her in her proper orbit in the political heavens. Innocent women and children were murdered; her virgin soil was moistened with the blood of free-State men, and the light of her burning dwellings flamed against the midnight sky. The Executive was implored; but Pierce, upon looking through the Constitution, could find no authority to interfere; and the darkest page of our history was written in blood. A slave gets loose, and is committing grand larceny by running away with himself; no necessity for consultation then; the lightning flashes the message to us: the land and naval force to recover the fugitive, and the court-house of a free Commonwealth is surrounded by bayonets and chains. Your homes in Virginia were invaded; we regret and sympathize with you; but have you no regrets or sympathies for the homes, just as sacred as yours, invaded in Africa? Had you tears for the children that were rendered fatherless and the wives widowed and driven shelterless, upon the open prairie in Kansas, by men having no claim to manhood but the color of their skin?

You reproach the North because, while we condemn the crime, we admire the noble qualities of manhood which Brown possessed. Your own Wise did as much; he said he was "lame, lonesome, and old," and it is no consolation to see such noble traits should be wasted in a reckless enterprise? You think it impossible that the man can be separated from the crime. Do you not remember, in the darkest hour of the Revolution, when the cause was lost, and it no longer remained in the young, the brave, and accomplished English officer descended to the character of a spy and, after Arnold's treachery, well-nigh eclipsed the rising sun of our independence? Can the mind conceive a greater crime, not only against America, but freedom and the world? He was arrested, tried, and executed; and notwithstanding the enormity of the offense, Washington and his generals, and the American people, sympathized with a hero being executed for gallant action against the enemy; they overlooked the crime, and thought of the grand utility of his manhood; and had it not been for the exigency of the public service, would gladly have pardoned the offender. And at this day, no American child reads the history of his country, but drops a tear on the page which records the fate of André.

You ask the men who are born amid the free institutions of the North, whose repose is given to their cradled hours in songs of universal liberty, whose limbs are strengthened by the air from the bold mountains, and whose hearts are warmed to all mankind by the lessons of the Revolution and the teachings of the Saviour, to restrain their anti-slavery sentiments, and believe, with you, that slavery is a Divine institution. No, no! There is no attribute of the Almighty, no command of His word, no spirit of His gospel, that can tolerate such a sentiment. "Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; ye shall hear the voice of the great God, ye shall fear the face of the face of man," was among the bill of rights God gave to the Jewish people. "A new command gave I unto you, that ye love one another; whatsoever ye would, that men should do to you, do ye even so to them," was the golden rule of the man of peace, given by the Saviour in John and Gentile; to all the world. A necessary corollary of these great principles led, in many years, to the emancipation, in the Declaration of American Independence, that man is created equal, and that each has an inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

While you eclipse the mind and dwarf the soul, you concede to the slave, both in prohibiting to him all means of knowledge by reading, and admitting him to be subject to the swing of power; the atonement; you say that slavery is a great missionary institution, redeeming from heathenism and converting to Christianity; you say that slaves become Christian men; that the Bible teaches them to be free; then, do you not understand that Bible, so they may comfort the unfulfilled longings of their souls, by a full realization that their lot is in the will of the Almighty, and "thus saith the Lord" hath enjoined it.

The distinction drawn from South Carolina, [Mr. KERR, after averring to the South all the glory of arms, and arms, and literature, according by the nation, then adds, speaking of the North: "What achievements of arms have illustrated their records? Sir, if a northern army should come down to subjugate the South, it will be the first one in our history that would be defeated by the Southern militia. Will it come now, or will it come in the trials of the Revolution? In 1781, when all the forces of the British were gathering upon the southern Virginia, the British had the advantage of the North."

The gentleman is evidently alarmed at his own shadow. Sir, it has never been thought or intimated that we are to subjugate the South. "What achievements of arms have illustrated their records?" Has the gentleman forgotten the battle of Gettysburg? Has he forgotten the war of 1812? I will not charge that he willingly seeks to cast an imputation on the patriotism and courage of our fathers. While I honor the memory of his ancestors, I would rescue that of my own from unjust aspersions, and hurl back the calumny in the face of its author. I regret that, in the blindness of fanaticism, and a reckless sectionalism, the distinguished gentleman should malign the northern patriots of the Revolution.

Sir, I will indulge in no unkind remark to wound the feelings of any man; but the charge must be met, and history vindicated; let the consequences fall where and as they may. One other gentleman spoke of Massachusetts burning witches in the ancient time. Does he suppose that your own people burn slaves at the stake, and it seems to awaken no horror in your minds?

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I pronounce the gentleman a liar and scoundrel. I pronounce the gentleman a liar and scoundrel, and he false.

Mr. VAN WYCK. My time is short, and I hope not to be interrupted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. You have no right to utter such foul and false slanders.

Mr. GARRETT. I rise to a point of order. It is that no member upon this floor has a right to libel the people of any section of this country, and then deny to the Representatives of that people the right to reply. I pronounce the assertion made by the gentleman false and unfounded. [Cries of "Order" and "The Republics, &c."]

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have heard such words before, and I am not to be disturbed or interfered with by any blustering of that sort. I am not here to libel any part of the Union.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. If you go outside of the District of Columbia and test the question of personal courage with any southern man?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I travel any where, and without fear of any one. For the first eight weeks of this session, you stood upon this floor continually libeling the North and the people of the free States, charging them with treason, and all manner of crimes, and now you are thrown into great rage when I utter a few facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York cannot be interrupted, except by a point of order; and the Chair appeals to gentlemen of the committee not to violate the rules of the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I shall observe them, sir, if others do; but I certainly will not permit southern people to be slandered.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If gentlemen are so sensitive in regard to their feelings, I shall permit them to register their feelings, if others do; if they were, we would not have had such wholesale denunciations of the people of the North as we had during the first eight weeks of this session.

Massachusetts has able sons to defend her reputation; but I do know she was first to light the flames of the Revolution; and I believe she will be the last to desert the watch-fire of the Union. The eloquent gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HORTLEA,] this endeavor to fasten an unkind charge upon the North, in my judgment misconceived history when he said Virginia, in 1775, sent succor to Massachusetts. There was no narrow sectionalism in those days. When the militia of his State were ordered to the aid of Massachusetts to fight the battles of Virginia; it was to vindicate the rights, and strike down the enemies of Virginia. The battle for your rights, gentlemen, was fought on northern soil; your homes, for a long time, were untouched by the foreign invader; for many years your builders were safe from the torch of the Hessian incendiaries; your women from indignities, and your helpless children from a cruel death. All this was sustained in the North; her commerce dismantled; her fields laid waste; her towns and villages laid in ruins; her offending children and women massacred. Could the men of the South do less than rush to the aid of their own cause by succoring Massachusetts? The impulse of freedom was equally strong in Virginia and Massachusetts. It was the crisis of the United Colonies; but Massachusetts then, as now, for her hatred of tyranny, was specially designated as the victim, and led the van in freedom's army. Your fathers were not the men to repose in inaction in the face of the war of 1812, or to come to fight, they were willing to spill their blood and lay their bones on the cold hills of the North. Let him be anathema, maranatha, who is not willing to do justice to you and them.

The glory of the men of the Revolution, from whatever section, belongs not to the North or the South. It is a union of glory which can never be dissolved. It belongs to the world, where liberty is worshipped, and Freedom receives the incense of her struggling millions. Sir, no country, however malignant, can blot out their memory. They are as far above your reach as the bold and heaven-defying eagle is above the earth-crawling and hissing serpent. You boast, and you have a right to boast; that you gave us a Washington; that the Moses of old, he led our armies to the promised land; but can Joshua and Aaron be gathered from the North. Because you gave us a Washington, and his bones rest on southern soil, we mean to preserve the Union forever. Mount Vernon and Monticello shall long be the Mecca and Medina of northern pilgrims.

Washington was clothed with absolute power over the Army. When he thought you wanted a general, he sent you Lincoln, then Gates. At Camden you had a sufficiency of troops. Your army numbered four thousand, and the enemy two thousand; yet you were overborne. I would come to charge it to a lack of courage. Then he sent the old Quaker of Rhode Island, General Greene, and he saved the men of Carolina.

After the attack on Charleston, in 1776, you were free from a foreign foe until 1779. Then the enemy invaded a part of his fort on the coast, because he expected sympathy and succor from the Carolinians and Georgia, on account of the great number of Tories in those States; and he did receive it. At the battle of King's Mountain, in the same rank of fifteen hundred, probably thirteen hundred were Carolina and Georgia Tories; hence the opening of a new seat of war in the South. I speak not to your injury. No country ever produced truer, braver patriots, than the Carolinians and Georgians. They had a stern conflict. They tried to fight the South on its own soil, and their Tory countrymen at the hearthstone.

The greatest cruelty and spoliation you suffered was at the hands of your native Tories, and from threats of rebellion and violence. I conclude their descendants are numerous on that soil. With their bloodmen to be descended on the soil of the South. But your brave men and women of the Revolution we can never forget. You may proscribe, imprison, and subject to stripes, our countrymen; distract and divide this great Confederacy; divorce your wives from their husbands; you may have passions of brotherly hate; yet the memory of your dashing Marston, and impetuous Sumpter, the heroism of your women at Charleston, will be cherished as long as freedom has a shrine in the hearts of the American people.

Would Washington, the son of Virginia, see his mother in jeopardy, and not rush to her relief? In 1781, when Cornwallis appeared in Virginia, although Clinton had a large fleet in the bay, and a large army in the city of New York, with brave impetuosity he marched his northern army, composed of men of all sections of the North, and with their tents, they "encamped on southern soil"; and the evening of the 18th day of October, 1781, drew its mantle over the mangled and lifeless northern soldier on the field of Yorktown. Virginia was visited and her towers and her towers were the bones left whitening on your sunny plains. Will gentlemen talk of northern courage? Where were fought the battles of 1812, 1813, and 1814? Whence came the seamen that humbled the proud navy of England, and gave us dominion on the seas? It is true you had your splendid victory at New Orleans; but that did not conquer a peace, for the treaty was signed before that battle was fought. Still, that did not detract from the glory of Jackson, or the valor of his troops. In all our wars, the North and the South were the victors; the victory, and are equally entitled to the glory.

Sir, in reading of the men of the Revolution, I have not been wont to limit their patriotism by State lines, or estimate their valor by the country they were born. Whether the rough blasts of the North rendered their courage more valiant, or quickened their blood, to me, whether from the North or South, like the men whom Zebah slew at Tabor, "each one resembled the children of a king."

Notwithstanding he now claims for the South all the glory of the past, the same distinguished gentleman, in his own State, in 1856, lamenting that South Carolina had no history, said:

"Where is your history? It is yet in tradition. The struggle is coming, the future is gloomy and lowering, and it is a sad business. Now is the time. Every memorable people, at all times, have had a history written on their monuments, on their pyramids, or in books. The nation mourned, and Clay and Webster wept down from their seats. Finally, he came in a ship and the State mourned, but no monument rises to mark his fame."

Such was the mournful condition of South Carolina, as faithfully portrayed by one of her most eloquent and earnest defenders. Why had South Carolina no history? Why had Calhoun no monument? You will find a ready answer in the acts and declarations of your fathers. Now, such as South Carolina is, do you wish to make the States hereafter to be added to the Union? Do you wish to entail upon them an inheritance, which, in after years, will compel from one of her sons so mournful a eulogium?

Gentlemen on this floor have been dolorous in their lamentations as to the heavy burdens they have suffered since the adoption of the Constitution, and that they have now become insupportable; and they have not the philosophy to say they can—

"Rather bear those ills they have,
Than fly to others that they know not of."

As we have had Democratic Administrations most of the time of their oppression, now, in order to relieve the miseries, real or imaginary, I know of no other remedy but a change of rulers; and for their sakes we must make a vigorous effort to restore the Republic to the principles of Madison and Jefferson, so that their troubled spirits may find rest.

You show a certain remnant of northern Democracy is a faithful ally. It has bent and bowed at your command. No doubt the old Free-Soil leaders believe as they did in 1848; but you must now allow them to assume any disguise, adhere to any standard, if they can only be camp-followers of the glorious legion. But you have determined, if they enter the Charleston convention, it must not be erect and with banners flying; but as the serpent when he entered the garden. You mean that the only entrance shall be through a hole in the wall; but when they enter, they will find the absorption of the serpent in the vision of Ezekiel's vision. They will find "that the bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it, and the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself in it." Treat them kindly, for they speak "in the speech of Abaddon," and will have to lie, for they "cannot manage to pronounce" your shibboleth.

You taunt us with cowardice; that we have not the courage to do as Brown did. May it long be our boast, as it is now our pride, that we have not the courage to do wrong.

"I dare do all that may become a man;
Who dares do more, is none."

Why this boast of courage? Are you not aware that bravery is an instinct of the man and brute creation? You see it in the gentle wren and the bold eagle, in the tiniest insect and the king of all nations; in every spot of the world, in all climates, and under all forms of society.

You never heard of a nation lacking bravery. It is not the result of education or religion; but the nearer you reach the barbarian and uncivilized, the stronger the instinct, the more stubborn the bravery, the greater the difference to torture and death. See the Goths and Vandals, as they poured out of the cold and gloomy recesses of the North and overran the polished Roman empire. See the Russian hater stand nyrviding before the science-directed missiles of the Allies. See the North American savages, with bows unsheathed, ready to brave all dangers in battle. Your knowledge of history will teach you that the most unconquerable bravery comes from the cold climates and rough regions of northern countries. Again I ask, why do gentlemen thus talk? Mark the first and second wars with England. Go home and ask the remnant of the gallant Palmetto regiment, who received the shock of battle on the plains of Mexico, who stood the New York volunteers, who, with them side by side, were in the hottest of the fight, at Churubusco, Cerro Gordo, and Chapultepec; and when your gallant Bulwer fell at the head of the regiments of my State and your northern warriors joined yours to carry him from the field, and regret that you so brave had fallen. Ask your own regiment what they think of northern bravery?

In the history of the country you provoked and incited a controversy in which you met northern bravery face to face on the plains of Kansas, and you quailed before it and fled. Ask your border-ruffian banditti what they think of northern courage? After the fight at Osawatomie, where Brown received his cognomen, your men cowered at the very thought of meeting the stern warriors of the North, sustained by right, in laudable array, and they made a precipitate flight, not waiting for the morning dawn, in spite of just such vaunts and boasts as you daily make on the floor of this House. Talk no more of northern courage. You have felt their steel and seen their spurs. They went not to meet in bloody strife, but to carve them out homes and fortunes amid those boundless prairies; but you met them as enemies, hedged up your highways, prevented their passage over your rivers by cannon, and compelled them to toil with arms in all four directions. Every one, had his sword girded by his side, and no builded, and half of them held the spears from the rising of the morning till the stars appeared." Sir, these men went as men of peace:

"They crossed the prairie, as the old
Our fathers erred did,
To make the West as they did East,
The homestead of the free."

But, sir, while bravery is an instinct, true courage is the result of education and disciplined blood; not to delight in the exhibition of physical ferocity, for mere gratification or personal resentment, but courageous from principle, to resist aggression and defend the right, at all hazard and every sacrifice.

Gentlemen, the great State which, in part, I represent, Sir, she needs no defense at my hands. Unlike South Carolina, she has a history written in books; also in the blood of her fathers, and the battle-field of the Revolution and the second war; upon her monuments and her aqueducts; in all her industrial, commercial, mechanical, manufacturing, benevolent, and educational enterprises. It is written upon her mountain sides; by the banks of her rivers, and upon her flowing streams; in her thousands of miles of telegraph, railroads, and canals; in the light of her commerce, that whitens every coast, and floats the stars and stripes in every port of the wide, wide world. When did she ever hesitate to respond to the demands of her country, whether the call was for treasure or blood? The craven, traitorous notes of disunion are never heard in her borders, from the Canada frontier to the valley of the Susquehanna, from the inland seas to the created waves of the Atlantic.

Let me speak of my own people—the district I more immediately represent. In the days of the Revolution, her sons went forward with her conquerors, the invader, and her women and children felt the knife and tomahawk and merciless barbarities of savage warfare. Through the valley of the Manakating and by the mountains of Mininkink

"The monarch green, the for, the monster brass,
With all her heavy, deadly beams."

On the evergreen mountains and by the crystal streams of Sullivan, and in the valleys of Orange, rest the bones of those who nobly fought and fell. The graves of those brave men have never been violated by the steps of the disunionist, or their long repose disturbed by the sound of rebellion. In that district still stands the old mansion occupied by Washington; in it the same chair in which he sat, and the same table on which he wrote his celebrated answer to the malicious letter of Armstrong, and the man on this floor of your own name of an army "victorious over its enemies, victorious over itself." On the same spot, too, he disbanded his grand army.

You reproach us because we will not do the menial service of bundling down your runaway slaves. There is not a man on this floor of your own name who would thus demean his manhood or disgrace his nobility. In my district there may be two or three men who believe with you that slavery is a Divine institution, and ought to be extended. There are none who would resist the execution of your fugitive slave law; but I am southern gentlemen have expressed a willingness to stand by the Constitution of our common country, to observe in good faith its obligations and promises. We, of the North, join hands with you here. We claim that we are not only loyal to this great fundamental law, but that we have been so in all times past. And here comes the issue to be tried: you charge us with numerous derelictions in duty; we charge them back upon you. You have arrested the great Republican party of the Union before the high court of the American people, and charged it with treason to the Constitution; we fling all special pleadings to the winds, join issue upon the merits, and go to the jury.

What is the Constitution? Is it a mere memorandum of an agreement, entered into by the States of this Union in their sovereign capacity as States, to be observed or broken at the pleasure of any one or more of the high contracting parties? Is it a great, confederated partnership, in which the several States have agreed to do business under the firm-name of "the Union," with the right reserved to each and every partner to withdraw at pleasure? Is it a compact or league between the several States, entered into, and ratified by their respective legislatures, which may be kept or broken at the will of any one or either of the parties thereto? Is this a fair interpretation of the Constitution? I answer most emphatically in the negative. The reasons for this opinion are numerous and weighty. This is not where the Constitution, then entered into, never has been formed. The thirteen original States or colonies, as far back as before the Revolution, entered into a compact; they reduced this compact to writing, and it is found in the old Articles of Confederation, framed in 1777. Acting under this compact, the thirteen colonies went forth to the world and posterity that great magna charta of Republican principles, the Declaration of Independence. Under this compact our fathers struggled and toiled through seven long years of revolutionary warfare, and achieved the independence and liberties of our common country. The preamble to this compact defines the "Articles of Confederation to be a perpetual union between the States;" while the thirteenth and last article closes by declaring "that the articles thereof shall be ratified by the States, and that the Union shall be perpetual." Why did our fathers abandon the old league or compact formed under these Articles of Confederation and substitute the Constitution? If they had been satisfied to have lived under a league or compact they would not have changed their form of government—and this is the reason that they preferred a Constitution to a compact.

Although there has been a slight conflict of opinion among American statesmen and jurists upon this subject, yet a vast majority of the authorities concur in this opinion, that the Constitution is not a league, compact, or confederacy, but a fundamental law. The idea that the Constitution is a mere compact between the States is completely refuted by the preamble. In the preamble, it declares the "people," and not the States, made it, in words too plain and direct to be mistaken: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, do ordain and establish this Constitution." I make these remarks as the basis of my argument, and not by any manner relative to the doctrine proclaimed by certain honorable gentlemen upon this floor, that a State, in its sovereign capacity, has a right peaceably to secede from the Union.

I now turn to another point involved in this question, namely the compact which was entered into upon the slavery question between the North and the South at the formation of the Constitution. Neither the word "slave" nor "slavery" anywhere appears in the Constitution, and this omission is not accidental. Mr. Madison, who had more to do with framing the Constitution than any other man, said, he "thought it wrong to admit into the Constitution the idea that there could be property in men." (3 Madison Papers, 142.) Mr. Sherman said, he "was opposed to a tax on slaves, because it was property in man." (3 Madison Papers, 1380.) Other members expressed similar opinions. Notwithstanding our fathers carefully guarded the language incorporated into the Constitution, with a direct view to the ultimate extinction of slavery, yet the fact is not to be denied, that the institution then existed in nearly all the States, "under the laws thereof," and this fact entered into the compromise which resulted in its formation and adoption. The first compromise agreed upon is found in article one, section two, clause three, of the Constitution, and was a direct concession to the South. This provision allows a property basis of representation upon this floor, which is not altogether without the operation which it gives to the slaveholding States to-day, as was truly remarked by an honorable gentleman from Mississippi, (Mr. LAMAR,) twenty Representatives in this House based upon property.

The members of the convention which framed the Constitution, from the North, contended that if "three fifths" of the slave property in the South was to be added to the "whole number of free persons," then the exports—the products of the slave population—should be taxed as an equivalent to the North. Mr. King expressed the opinions of the North when he said: "At all events, either slaves should not be represented or exports should be taxable." (3 Madison Papers, 1262.) The only equivalent which the North received was the connecting provision in the article and which was simply what is known to-day as the "direct taxes," they should be apportioned according to the basis of representation; and, as we raise our taxes from a tariff of duties levied upon imports, this provision is worthless to the people of the free States.

The next compromise embodied in the Constitution upon the slavery question is found in section nine, article one:

"The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808; but no tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten cents for each person."

Prior to this time, Maryland, Virginia, and several other States, had abolished the foreign slave trade. A large majority of the convention desired to abolish it at once. We have the most conclusive evidence upon this point. Mr. Ingham, in the North Carolina State convention called to ratify the Constitution, said:

"It was the wish of a great majority of the convention to put an end to the trade immediately, but South Carolina and Georgia would not agree to it."

"It is probable that all the members repudiated the inhuman traffic, but South Carolina and Georgia would not consent to an immediate prohibition of it; one reason was, that the revolution war, the revolution war, the loss of a number of negroes, which they wished to supply."—3 Elliot's Debates, 96, 97, 98.

Mr. Spaight, the same convention, said that "the limitation of this trade to the term of twenty years was a compromise between the eastern and southern States—South Carolina and Georgia wished to extend the term—the eastern States insisted on the entire abolition of the trade."—3 Elliot's Debates, 96.

General Pinckney, in the South Carolina ratification State convention, said, that while some of the eastern States were willing, for the sake of the South, to wait a little before putting stop to the slave trade:

"The middle States and Virginia made no such provision; they were for an immediate and total prohibition."—3 Elliot's Debates, 325.

Thus the fact is established and proved, that Congress was prevented from abolishing the slave trade for twenty years, as special favor to two southern States of this Union.

The only remaining clause in the Constitution relating to slavery is article four, section two, clause three:

"No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor; but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

This provision was another concession to slaveholding States.

It is now so important to inquire whether the framers of the Constitution considered slavery national or local? The rendition clause just quoted is an answer to the question: "Persons held to service or labor in one State; under the laws thereof." Here they put upon record, in the great foundation of our country, the fact that slaves are held "under the laws" of the States, and not by force of the Constitution. Its framers so expressed themselves in the constitutional convention. Mr. Gerry said:

"We had nothing to do with the conduct of States as to slaves; but ought to be careful not to give any sanction to it."—3 Madison Papers, page 1264.

They left the whole question where they found it—with the States; to be continued or abolished as they severally, in their sovereign capacities, should determine.

II. The framers of the Constitution made that instrument with the desire and expectation that slavery would ultimately be abolished in all the States; that in this country it would come to a final end. This proposition is clearly demonstrated in their openly avowed opinions upon the slavery question.

General Washington, although a slaveholder believed slavery wrong. He freely expressed himself upon this point, and has left the clearest evidence behind him upon this question.

Thomas Jefferson, in his official acts and public writings, has left to posterity a record that cannot be mistaken. In his Notes on Virginia, he boldly declares:

"I ardently wishes more directly than I, an abolition not only of the slave trade, but of the condition of slavery." (Page 170.)

Gouverneur Morris, in the convention which formed the Constitution, said:

"He never could consent to uphold human slavery; it was a nefarious institution."—3 Madison Papers, 1262.

Mr. Sherman said:

"That the abolition of slavery seemed to be going on in the United States, and that the good sense of the several States would, probably by degrees, complete it."—3 Madison Papers, 1280.

Colonel Mason, of Virginia, said:

"Slavery discourages the arts and manufactures, and brings the judgment of Heaven on a country."—3 Madison Papers, 1261.

In the Virginia convention to ratify the Constitution, Mr. Henry said:

"Slavery is detested; we feel its fatal defects; we deplore it with all the pity of humanity."—3 Elliot's Debates, 427.

The illustrious William Pinckney, in the Maryland Legislature, in 1788, said:

"By the eternal principles of eternal justice, no man in the State has the right to hold his slave in bondage for a single hour." "In the name of Heaven, can I call ourselves the friends of freedom and the inherent rights of our species, when we wantonly pass laws inimical to each; when we reject every opportunity of destroying, by slight unimportant degrees, the bondage of individual bondage, reared by the mercenary hands of those from whom the sacred flame of liberty received its derivation?"—William's Speeches of the United States, volume 5.

But I will not further elaborate a proposition which cannot be successfully denied, by quoting additional extracts from the writings of early American statesmen.

2. The hypothesis here set up is proved by the contemporaneous acts of our fathers. The provision in the Constitution relating to the suppression of the slave trade after 1808, is strong evidence to this point. The enacting of the celebrated ordinance of 1787, which abolished slavery on the west side of the States was made force free, is another incontrovertible proof of their intentions.

3. The opinions of the founders of this Republic were not only acquiesced in and indorsed, but when as authoritative expositions of the Constitution by nearly all the great statesmen of the country during the first sixty years of its existence.

First. That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to prohibit slavery in the Territories. The ordinance of 1787, passed by the first Congress under the Constitution, in which were twenty members of the Federal convention which framed the Constitution, is a direct exercise of this power. It passed unanimously, and was approved by General Washington. Subsequent acts, in which the same principle was evenly recognized, were passed, as follows: an act, April 7, 1798, organizing Mississippi Territory; in the Sixth Congress, an act organizing Indiana Territory; an act, March 26, 1804, dividing Louisiana into two Territories; January 11, 1805, an act organizing Michigan Territory; February 13, 1809, an act establishing Illinois Territory; June 4, 1812, an act establishing Missouri Territory; March 3, 1817, an act relating to Alabama Territory; March 9, 1819, an act establishing Arkansas Territory; March 6, 1820, the Missouri compromise was established; March 10, 1829, an act establishing Florida Territory; April 20, 1836, an act establishing Wisconsin Territory; June 12, 1838, an act for the government of Iowa; and March 3, 1848, an act establishing the government of Oregon.

These different acts received the sanction of fourteen different Congresses, and the official approval of Presidents Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Van Buren, and Polk. All these acts directly acknowledged the constitutional power of Congress to prohibit slavery in the Territories, and that it was right and expedient to exercise it.

Secondly. Until within a very few years, the opinions of the early statesmen that slavery was dependent upon State regulations for its existence and protection—a local and not a national institution—has been uniformly concurred in by Congress, State Legislatures, the judiciary of the United States, and of the several States. The proof is found in the acts of Congress, of State Legislatures, and in the numerous decisions of the United States and State courts.

Mr. Chairman, having briefly referred to the Constitution, its compromises upon the slavery question, the rules of construction applicable to it, as handed down to us by its framers, and concurred in by all the States, I now come to a material point involved in this discussion. Has the South received what legitimately belonged to her under the Constitution? and if there have been sectional aggressions, from which party have they come?

In discussing this matter, I shall deal in facts and figures, and not in inflammatory declamation and vague generalities, which have been so much indulged in by gentlemen upon the other side.

Has the North and the property representation guaranteed by the Constitution? No one denies it, and she has to-day twenty Representatives upon this floor upon a property basis, while the free States have none. Taking the census of 1850 as the basis of calculation, six million whites in the North, and twenty-one million negroes, ninety members; thirteen million in the North have one hundred and forty-seven members. A ratio equal with the South would give the North one hundred and ninety-eight members.

2. The South has always had the benefit of a fictitious slave law to restrict the slave population. Some of the provisions of the present law are extremely obnoxious to the people of the free States; yet it has been enforced with as little difficulty as any other law of doubtful constitutionality and made for the exclusive benefit of a particular section of country. It is true, slaves sometimes run away and are not recaptured and carried back; and just as long as they possess the power of locomotion, just so long more or less of their number will abscond. This very fact is a sad commentary upon the assertion often made, respecting this uncertain kind of property, that the African prefers slavery to freedom.

It would be passing strange if the whole subject of negro slavery could be discussed upon slave territory, in the midst of the slave population, by southern politicians, as they have done for several years last past, without waking up, in the minds of some of this degraded race, ideas of personal liberty. If these negroes love slavery, and are contented, of course they will remain there; but if they get a little of Bunker Hill or Yorktown into their heads, judging from the past, they will be quite likely to suffer their magnetic attractions to vibrate in the direction of the north pole. Northern people are not to blame for all this. It is one of the incidents which always did and always will connect itself with your peculiar institution. Just so long as there is slavery, just so long there will be runaways from it. All past history proves this fact.

Southern men sometimes complain that the people of the free States obstruct the due execution of the fugitive slave law; but they are mistaken in this assumption. In the first place, some of the features of the law itself, by the grossness of the people of the free States, considered cruel and unjust, and many of the best legal minds in the North think it unconstitutional. Then, again, the way and manner in which you have undertaken to execute it are highly exceptionable. Under some fraudulent, false pretense, the fugitive is often assaulted, knocked down, and dragged off like a dog, hurried away before some five-dollar commissioner, and by him summarily sent off into slavery, upon proof that would not warrant a magistrate in giving judgment for a claim of four or five years before a country jury.

The very first person you undertook to reclaim under this law was a free man, and when your Union-saving slave-catchers from New York landed him at the door of his alleged master, in Maryland, like an honest, high-minded, honorable man—“I am free to say many of the slaveholders are—be denied ever owning him, and the kidnappers had to let him run. A fair trial in a case which places a person's personal liberty for life in the power of a single man, and that man sometimes the corrupt tool of the power that made him, is an enough, if all conscience, for those engaged in this business undertake to make a mockery of this, do you wonder the people of the free States sometimes get a little excited?

If our southern friends expect the people of the free States to turn slave hunters, and join in the chase in running down the passing fugitive, they will be disappointed. We never agreed to any such thing, and we never will do it: it is not “in the bond.” Just give the person arrested as a fugitive the same chance to test the question of his personal freedom, just as you would a plaintiff in a suit at law to recover over twenty dollars' value in other property, and you will find no obstacle in the North to the enforcement of a judicial law for the recovery of fugitive slaves.

Bad as the law is, and as objectionable as is the manner in which it is attempted to be executed, it is enforced by the people of the free States. The honorable gentleman from Ohio (ex-Governor Cowen) has told you in this House it is enforced in the West. So it is in the middle States, and so it is in the New England. Yes, sir, Boston courts have been put in chains, and the peaceable people of that State kept out of the temple of justice by Federal bayonets, and the Treasury of the United States robbed of its thousands and tens of thousands to pay the bills for returning a fugitive.

It is easy enough to stand up and charge the people of the free States with being disloyal to the Constitution in this particular; but a fair, impartial investigation will show all such allegations unfounded. It is due to fairness to add, that individually, I believe the present fugitive slave law is unconstitutional, and if a bill were introduced into this House for its unconditional repeal, I would vote for it, and in so doing should reflect the opinions of a vast majority of my constituents of all parties.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to stop here, but shall pursue this subject further, and show that the people of the free States have not only kept good faith with the South so far as their constitutional obligations are concerned, but have done more than to faithfully perform other matters growing out of the relations existing between the two sections. This leads me to my third point under this division of my subject:

At the treaty of peace in 1783, the United States had a Territory of 800,000 square that we have acquired by—
The Louisiana purchase..... 809,579
The Florida purchase..... 69,990
The Texas acquisition..... 210,000
The Oregon territory..... 286,032
The treaty with Mexico..... 224,365

Total territory acquired since 1783..... 2,113,496

From the territory thus purchased, there have been five new slave States admitted into the Union, to wit: Louisiana, Missouri, Arkansas, Florida, Texas, and California. There have also been California, Iowa, Minnesota, and Oregon. The free States have ten Senators and sixteen Representatives in Congress; the four free States eight Senators and seven Representatives. And in this division of territory between the two sections, the free States have been the aggressors in the annexation of Texas has provision that the free slave States may be carried out of that territory. To say nothing of this, the South has, under territory thus acquired, one more State, two more United States Senators, and nine more Representatives, than the free States; and yet they keep up their cry of aggression! aggression! against the North.

Another inquiry here suggests itself. What has been the cost of the territory purchased by the United States, and who paid for it, the people of the free or slave States? I have spent a good deal of time and labor in collecting from the documents of the Government, from the public sources, the aggregate cost of our acquired territory—many of the items can be accurately stated, others have to be estimated. The expense of the Mexican war is given by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report in 1851. (Appendix to Globe, volume 22, page 21.) Below I give in a table, the result of my investigation, and where I have been obliged to form estimates, have been careful not to overstate them.

Louisiana Territory, purchased in 1803.....	$15,000,000
Interest paid on same.....	8,257,253
Indian bought of Spain.....	5,000,000
Interest paid on same.....	1,420,000
Texas, for indemnity claim.....	10,000,000
Texas, for credit on Thirty-Third Congress, Indian expenses, all kinds interests (estimate).....	7,500,000
To purchase Navy, pay troops (estimate).....	5,000,000
All other expenditures not included above (estimate).....	3,000,000
Expense of Mexican war.....	$17,175,375
Soldiers' pensions and bounty lands (estimate).....	7,000,000
Expense of Florida war.....	100,000,000
Soldiers' pensions and bounty lands (estimate).....	12,500,000
To remove Indians, &c. (estimate).....	5,000,000
Amount paid for New Mexico, by treaty, 1850.....	10,000,000
Paid to indemnify Indian title (estimate).....	100,000,000
Paid for Georgia.....	3,000,000
Paid for Arizona, purchased of Mexico.....	15,000,000

$942,764,928

Who paid the bills? Let us see. I find that by the researches I have made from official documents, and other reliable sources of information, that from 1791 to 1850, the total revenue collected from customs and excises, turning it up to this time, an amount of my calculations, as follows: 1850: Whole amount of revenue collected..... $1,460,599,965
Amount of revenue in free States..... 802,225,955
Expense of collecting in free States..... 38,494,928
Net sum paid into Treasury from free States..... 763,731,027
Amount of revenue in slave States..... 327,016,928
Expense of collecting in slave States..... 17,362,393
Net sum paid into Treasury from slave States..... 210,111,465
Balance paid by free States..... 673,619,562

Thus, facts and figures prove that, while the slave States have taken the “lion's share” from the territory purchased, the free States have paid taxes and borne the expenses of the same.

Third. Let us look at some of the offices under the General Government, and see whether the South has had its share. I have prepared from the official records the following table, which speaks for itself. From this, it appears that the South has six millions, have over three fifths of the important offices, and the North, with thirteen millions, less than two fifths. I have looked into the localities from which our foreign ministers, consuls, and other important officers have been taken, and find that the South have had more than double the number to which they have been entitled by their relative population.

Y	Years filled from slave States	Years filled from free States	Difference in favor of the South
President of the United States.....	48	96	92

The South have not been contented with monopolizing nearly all the great offices in the country, but they make a carefully prepared list of the subordinate places. In all the Departments in this city northern men have been crowded out to make way for southerners. I find, in a speech which I made in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, the following table, which I carefully prepared from the Blue Book. From this, it appears that the North, taking their population as a basis, are fairly can-titled to more than two thirds, yet they get only about one fourth. Oh, the aggressive North!

Just look at the committees of both branches in the last Congress, and then cry out "northern aggression." Of the twenty-two important committees in the Senate, the slave States had the chairman upon sixteen, and the free States six. And of the twenty-five important committees of the House, the South had the chairman upon seventeen, and the North eight. Thirteen million free whites in the North are represented at the head of fourteen standing committees in Congress, while six million in the South are represented at the head of thirty-three standing committees. This pecking operation on committees to favor the South was no new thing in the Thirty-Fifth Congress; they have always had it in just that kind of a way. Still, northern aggression! It should lie borne in mind that these committees shape the whole legislation of the country.

Again; look at the Senate committees of this Congress; out of twenty-two committees, the North have the chairman upon sixteen, and the South on six; and upon every single one of the fourteen important committees, the slave States have all the chairmen. Of the eighteen free States represented in the Senate, fourteen are totally disfranchised upon the basis of the Senate committees; while twenty-four Republican Senators, representing more than twelve million of the people of the Union, out of one hundred and twenty-five places on said committees, get only thirty-nine, and that, and the last end of every one upon which they are needed. I call upon the country, North and South, to look at this beautiful picture of nationality, equality, Democracy, and stagnation, generous South. Below is the looking glass. Look into it; if you do not "see the elephant" you cannot fail to see the "negro."

Fourth. In 1800 the seat of the General Government was, by virtue of a previous act of Congress, removed to the slave territory where it now stands. Washington was then nearly an unbroken wilderness; now it numbers nearly seven thousand inhabitants. Northern troops brought the seat of Government here; and it has been built up, to a very great extent, by northern treasure. These splendid massive piles of marble, which rear their lofty columns in every direction in this city, were built by Government money, which was given the benefit of laws that stretch themselves out around these buildings like some panoramic fancy sketches!

Who planted the shade trees that ornament them? Government money did this. Yes, sir, the Federal Treasury has been expending for the last sixty years of its millions and tens of millions to build up this great city upon slave territory. Who gets the benefits? Principally the slave States. Washington city furnishes a great market for southern produce, raised in Virginia, the Potomac land. The Government not only has built this city, but annually appropriates enormous sums from the Federal Treasury to support it. It grades and lights its streets, paves its walks. It sends men up to the top of the Potomac, and plundered the national Treasury of about five million dollars to furnish the city with splendid water works. It indirectly feeds and clothes a large number of its inhabitants. It furnishes their swaddling clothes from first they open their eyes upon the light of creation, and pays the section's bill when life's painful scenes are over. The North, for their Representatives, in return, get good hotels and boarding places, by paying Washington prices, subject only to occasional annoyances from some of the peculiar friends of the "peculiar institution," and "subject also to the Constitution of the United States."

But I will do no injustice to the good people of the city of Washington, but will give them an item or two, which may give me the right to make a few general allegations. It is this: they gratuitously furnish an army of patriotic men who are exceedingly anxious to serve their country, in places of trust and profit, who will, just as circumstances require, sing psalms to Douglas or Seward, to Jackson or Sumner, always pitching their key-note to the tune of the "loaves and fishes." And, as evidence of their patriotism and loyalty to the Constitution, we have heard many of their numbers, as they lay during the closing of the Congress, vociferously applying disunion sentiments uttered upon this floor, which, if carried into practical operation, would raise this magnificent Capital to the ground a heap of smoldering ruins, light up their houses with the torch-light of the incendiary, destroy their fields, murder their children in a war of strife, and make this great city only a fit habitation for the owls and bats.

Having shown that the North has been generous to the South, and fulfilled all its constitutional obligations to her in letter and in spirit, now desire, in all fairness, to examine the other side of this question; and in discharging this part of my duty, I shall "carry the war into Africa."

I. Article one of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States provides that—

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

I charge that the South has not always in good faith lived up to the above provision, inasmuch as that section of the Union, for a great number of years, by congressional action, aided by northern Democrats, refused to receive petitions coming from the people of the free States. Gag resolutions, by which the petitions of the people were treated with contempt, were from year to year forced through Congress. For years the people were up to the neck in petitions, and yet they were summarily met, and their petitions kicked out of doors in both Houses of Congress. For a long time this war of the slaveholding interest against the people was waged with ferocity, but at length, through the determined will and interference of the "old man eloquent," aided by his patriotic co-workers, the rights of American citizens were once more restored, and the Constitution vindicated against those who had rudely assailed it.

The South has undertaken, in carrying out their aggressive policy upon the North, to reverse the territorial policy of the Government, as established by its founders, and concurred in by every national Administration for more than half a century.

I shall not now stop to point out the constitutional right of Congress to inhibit slavery in the Territories, for that has been successfully done a thousand times before, upon the floors of Congress by the southern members. I have already said mainly what I desire to say upon that point.

As we have shown—from the passage of the ordinance of 1787 to the establishment of Oregon Territory in 1848—the policy of every department of the Government was against the Congress had the right under the Constitution to prohibit slavery in the Territories of the United States. Hence it follows, that the introduction of the Wilmot proviso was, in no proper sense, an infringement upon the Government's rights; and it has made a great fundamental principle of the Government itself. The very converse of this proposition was true, that the resistance of the South to the application of this wholesome rule to the territory acquired by the treaty with Mexico, was, per se, an aggression upon northern rights.

At this juncture of affairs in this country, what right had the South to step up to the North and demand a new policy? What right had the southern States to carry their local laws into the Territories, to the exclusion of the people of the free States.

But our southern friends claim what they call an equal right in the territory of the United States. But the demand they make does not stop with an "equal" balancing of the scales. They demand more. They not only ask to carry with them into the Territories everything which the common law recognizes as property—everything as property which the people of the free States may carry with them, but they demand to establish and plant upon free territory a system of involuntary servitude, which invades the rights of the free laborer from the North, robs him of his capital, disgraces him in society, and in the end drives him away, as I shall hereafter show.

If it is said the Constitution, proprio rigore, establishes slavery in the Territories, I answer, that is begging the question. We deny it; and that is the very question now in issue which the people, and not the Supreme Court of the United States, have got to settle.

3. The terms upon which Texas was annexed to the United States were unjust to the North and free States; and I do not intend to notice all the plots and counterplots of the South, when Texas annexation was first agitated, nor the recent manner in which the terms of annexation were consummated, by which we were involved in the Mexican war, but simply refer to the connection of this scheme with the slavery question. This was a southern measure, and it was for the interest in this country. Its whole history shows it. The joint resolutions providing for annexation provided for the formation of four new States out of this territory; and, in fairness, the free States, at least an equal portion should have free territory; but, instead of this, they provide that all territory south of 36° 30' should be left open to slavery, and all north of that line free. Now, any one who will take pains to look upon a map of Texas, will find only a mere fragment lying north of the Missouri compromise line. It is too small ever to make a single State, and is a virtual surrender of the whole territory to slavery, under the miserable pretense of a division. Mr. Buchanan refused to receive petitions coming from the people of the free States, and yet he now turns round, in wonder and astonishment, and declares "it is strange that any one ever thought it constitutional!" and because the people of the free States refuse to turn a ridiculous sentiment like him, he insinuates that by connecting them as traitors and fanatics. Beautiful consistency!

4. The next aggression upon the North which I shall notice, was the repeal of the Missouri compromise. The history of that compromise has been so thoroughly reviewed before the country, that a repetition of it is unnecessary. It is sufficient to say that it was a southern measure. Upon the vote on the question of admitting Missouri with the restriction, twenty Senators from the South voted for it—only two from the North. The vote of Representatives, upon the vote inacting the Missouri restriction, thirty-nine southern Representatives voted for it, and thirty-seven against. We have not only the recorded vote to show this a southern measure, but the testimony of the point. Charles Pickens, of South Carolina, who was a member of that Congress, and voted against the bill, in a letter, dated "Congress Hall, March 2, 1830, three o'clock, at night," speaking of the Missouri compromise, said:

"It is considered here by the slaveholding States as a great triumph."

Mr. Benton, in his Thirty Years in the United States Senate, says:

"This [the Missouri compromise] was the work of the South, sustained by the CRISTED VOICE OF MR. MORRIS'S CABINET, the united voice of the southern Senators, and a majority of the southern Representatives."

Mr. Monroe's Cabinet then consisted of John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State; John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War; William H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury; Smith Thompson, Secretary of the Navy; John McLean, Postmaster General; and William Wirt, Attorney General.

No special pleading, no circumlocution of argument, no declamation can destroy or blot out these facts. There they stand, and there they will forever stand, as conclusive proof that the Missouri compromise was a southern measure; the "work of the South," and a "great southern triumph." The consideration received by the South for the restriction, was paid down by the admission of Missouri as a slave State.

This leads to another inquiry. Has the South stood by their own compromise, or violated it? This question, too, shall be answered by study of the facts—facts which politicians neither North or South can ever dispute. In the Senate, upon the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, nineteen southern Senators voted for it; two against it. In the House, sixty-nine southern members voted for it, and nine against it. And we see the costly record, because a northern man introduced the bill, it is a northern measure. It is true, members from the free States voted for the bill; but, in doing it, they outraged their constituents; who have, for this very act, sent nearly every one of them to their political graves. And we are told that which knows no waking. "Well gentlemen from the South stand up here and tell me that a bill which commanded the votes of eighty-eight southern men, with only seven against it, was not a southern measure? If it be Kansas and Nebraska, will be sent to the House, my answer is, no thanks to the South for that. I charge, then, that the Missouri compromise was a southern measure; and that the southern men went almost entirely in a body for a violation of their own compact—a compact to which they had made themselves a party."

5. My next charge against the South is, that, after it had broken down the Missouri restriction, under the pretense that the people of a Territory, under the Kansas-Nebraska bill, to be "left perfectly free to form and regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way," it undertook to force slavery into Kansas, first by violence, and secondly by fraud.

The first election held in Kansas was on the 29th day of November, 1854. The polls were then forcible possession of the words of armed ruffians from the slave States; and, out of 2,253 votes cast for General Whitfield, the Democratic candidate for Congress, 1,729 were thrown by those lawless invaders. These facts appear in the report of a committee of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, sent out by the House to expose these frauds. (See House Document No. 200, first session Thirty-Fourth Congress.)

In January and February, 1855, a census of the inhabitants of the Territory was taken, by order of the Governor, and 2,905 men were found, by this census, qualified to vote for members of a Territorial Legislature. On the 30th of March, of the same year, an election for members of a Territorial Legislature was held. At this election another armed force was made into the Territory, and 6,300 votes were cast. A subsequent investigation proved only 1,410 legal votes thrown; leaving 4,900 illegal votes cast by ruffian invaders.

The Territorial Legislature chosen at this worse than mock election, passed the infamous "Kansas code," a compilation of law worse than the code of Draco. This illegitimate Legislature passed an act providing that in October, 1856, the people should vote whether a constitutional convention should be called or not. The bona fide citizens of the Territory spurned the act of these "usurpers," and refused to participate in the election.

A few tools of the Administration voted; and the bogus Legislature, on the 19th of February, 1857, passed an act providing for the election of delegates to frame a State constitution. The law providing for the convention and election of delegates required a census to be taken, and the votes registered in the thirty-four counties recognizing an election districts. In nineteen of these thirty-four counties there was no census taken; and in fifteen of the thirty-four there was no registry of votes. Governor Walker, in his letter of resignation, says these fifteen dismembered counties could not vote; voters there were cast in the whole Territory at this election. This election was a mockery; and the main body of the free-State men very properly refused to have anything to do with it.

Subsequently, the people of Kansas, at their territorial election in October, 1857, achieved an overwhelming free-State victory. After this, the convention of "usurpers" assembled, and framed the atrocious "Lecompton constitution." These "usurpers" did not dare to submit this constitution to a fair vote of the people, for they knew the result; it is no longer required; and no alteration should be made to affect the right of property in the ownership of slaves, until after 1864; and then provided, in the schedule, that it should be submitted to the people, and the ballots should contain, for the constitution with slavery, or for the constitution without slavery.

At the election on the 21st of December, 1857, the pro-slavery clause was voted into this constitution by illegal votes and false returns. These frauds were investigated by the Governor of the Territory, and it was found that at Osage, where there were but forty-two votes all told, over one thousand votes were returned. At Shawnee, where there were but forty legal votes, twelve hundred votes were returned; and from Delaware Crossing, which had only forty-three legal votes, four hundred votes were returned. I have not stopped to even glance at cities attacked, peaceable citizens murdered in cool blood, public highways lined with assassins and robbers—burglaries, arson, and other crimes, committed by border-ruffian raids into Kansas—but this briefly given a sufficient history of the pro-slavery violence of the ballot-box, up to the time the Lecompton swindle was sent to Congress by James Buchanan.

Well knowing these facts, the President of the United States not only sent this constitution to Congress, with a message urging its adoption, but he also took the whole power of patronage of the Administration to force it through Congress. Is proof demanded? Let me call attention to some remarks made in this House by an honorable member from New Jersey, who was also a member of the last Congress: I mean Mr. A. C. AUSTIN. He said:

"During the Lecompton controversy, I was approached in such a manner as shows corruption on the part of the Administration. If I had given my support to the Lecompton policy, I was assured that I could secure a foreign appointment for one month and dear to me."—Daily Globe of December 13.

It is a gross and solitary case, among many others. No greater outrage was ever attempted to be perpetrated upon the people of the free States; and yet it was most emphatically a southern measure. Here is the proof: in the Senate, every southern member, with two exceptions, voted for the bill; and in the House, the only free-State member, with seven exceptions, supported the measure.

The measure finally assumed the shape of the English bill: went to the people of Kansas, and was by them rejected with scorn and contempt for more than a thousand times.

This is a "specimen article" of Democratic popular sovereignty. I leave the country to make further comments.

6. The South have undertaken to drive free labor from the Territories by force of judicial construction.

I here refer to the Dred Scott decision, in which a majority of the court have traveled out of the record to overturn the well-settled opinions of a great majority of American jurists and statesmen, agreed to and acquiesced in in all parts of the country, for more than thirty years. In fact, a majority of the judges decided Dred Scott was not a citizen of the United States, and was not rightfully in court, it was an end of the case. But when they undertook to travel out of the record and give opinions involving questions not legally before them, their opinions have no binding force upon the people of the country. The able and conclusive opinions of Justices McLean and Curtis, upon the question of congressional intercession in the Territories, are entitled to equal respect with those of a majority of the court. Great political questions, involving masters of national policy, are for the people, not the Supreme Court. "The alien and addition laws of John Adams' day were by the court decided constitutional, and so was a national bank; but the people rebuked this attempted abridgment of their rights by the court, and overruled their decisions." James Buchanan entertained and expressed the same opinions now entertained by the Republican party upon this question, in 1841. "On the 7th of July, of that year, he made a speech in the United States Senate on the bank question. Spraying of the fact that the United States Court had decided a national bank constitutional, he said:

"Now, if it were not unparliamentary language, and if I did not desire to treat all my friends on this [Wang] side of the House with the respect which I feel for them, I would say that the idea of the question having been really decided to bind the consciences of members of Congress when voting on the present bill, is ridiculous and absurd. If all the members of Congress were to be bound to do so, it would be the affirmative, where the question is thus brought home to me as to whether I should be bound to do so. I do not see, upon such support the Constitution, I must exercise my own judgment. I would treat with profound respect the arguments of those who are in the majority of the court; but, if, after all, they fail to convince me that the law was constitutional, I should be guilty of perjury before high Heaven."

But even if the judiciary had settled the question, I should never feel myself bound by their decision while acting in the capacity of a Senator of the United States, or of Massachusetts. [Mr. Bates.] I shall never consent to play the liberties of the people in the hands of any judicial tribunal."

Now, this same James Buchanan studies himself, allows the South to back him down from the tenable position he occupied in 1841; takes the back seat, and then, in the year 1857, when the Supreme Court has "made a final settlement of the slavery question in the Territories," that "neither Congress nor a Territorial Legislature, nor ANY HUMAN POWER, can annul or impair;" and yet, because the people refuse to follow him, he briefly gives a sufficient conclusion to his judicial despotism and tyranny, the President insults their honesty and intelligence, by denouncing them as traitors and fanatics.

The obiter dictum of the court in the Dred Scott case, relative to congressional sovereignty over the Territories, was never brought by the South, and no attempt made by Democratic politicians to give it the authority of law. This is an assumption against right; a demand set up against the people of the North without authority. The people of the North were neither parties nor privies in the Dred Scott case, and hence they are not estopped from contesting the usurpations set up against them by the court. The sequence growing out of these premises cannot be misunderstood. This attempt to plant slavery upon free soil, and spread it over every foot of territory outside of State lines, and deprive the free men of the right taken to say so, in a matter not legally before them, is a most unwarrantable aggression against the people of the free States. It is such an unjustifiable encroachment upon the rights of the free-bearing millions of this country as they never will submit to. It is a policy of manifestly bad policy, which can never be made national in the Union or out of it. It is a demand made by less than half a million slaveholders to monopolize more than one million square miles of territory, to the exclusion of twenty-five million freemen, who have no interest in slave property. It is a monstrous aggression, and one that should be met and repelled at every hazard, and without regard to consequences.

7. The South, although numerically less by one half than the North, and with a smaller share of the General Government. Men of the South, especially her politicians, seem to have got an idea into their heads that they are born to rule and the people of the free States are born to obey. It is the boast of the slaveholders that they have ruled and governed the country from its infancy, and now to what a distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] said in a speech in the United States Senate, March 4, 1856:

"The Senator from New York [Mr. SAWARD] says that you intend to make the Southern Government a Government from our hands. Perhaps that he says is true—it may be a but do not forget, it can never be forgotten, it is written on the brightest page of human history, that WAS THE SLAVEholders of the South, look our country in her infancy; and, after gazing for sixty out of seventy years of her existence, she shall surrender her to you without a stain upon her honor, business in prosperity, and the people strong, the wonder and admiration of the world."—Appendix to the Congressional Globe, volume 37, page 71.

The honorable Senator says "the slaveholders of the South have ruled the country sixty out of seventy years," and he understands the matter precisely as I do, that they are ruling it now. According to the last census, the free white population of the United States was, in gross numbers, eighteen million, and while this favored class—the slaveholders—numbered less than three hundred and fifty thousand, they rule and control about a half million not possessed of slave property. African slavery has been converted into an engine of political power through the agency of the Democratic party. Under what article or section in the Constitution has an armory of wealth, combined with three hundred and fifty thousand persons, "ruled" the teeming millions of this country for "sixty out of seventy years?" It is nowhere to be found. It has been a usurpation, another aggression to which the people of the free States have too long submitted. Yes, you have ruled us, and every other interest of the country has been made to bow down to the Moloch of slavery.

If it is asked how the South, being in the minority, has succeeded in controlling the country? I answer, it has succeeded by creating and fostering a spirit of sectionalism through the agency of its machinery. Colonel Benton, who is certainly good authority in this matter, in his Thirty Years in the Senate, says, that Mr. Calhoun, in 1830—

"Went home from Congress and told his friends that the South could never be united against the North on the tariff question; that the party interested in Louisiana would keep her out; that the basis of Louisiana must be tilted to the slave question."—Volume 9, page 10.

This policy of "uniting the slave States" upon the tariff question was inaugurated by Mr. Calhoun. It was perpetuated by him and his followers until it entirely broke up old party lines. It destroyed the old Whig party, and completely corrupted and sectionalized the Democratic party, and placed it under the control of the slave power, where it has remained until this day. "The South," says Colonel Benton declares, in the work already alluded to, was originated to kill Mr. Van Buren, and it did its work. He had a majority of votes at the national convention, in 1844, at which Mr. Polk was chosen; but the Southern vote had been "a two-thirds rule," which enabled them to defeat him. The South in the same convention defeated the late Governor Fairfield, of my own State, for the Vice Presidency, and nominated Mr. Dallas; although the latter had but thirteen votes on the first ballot. The South nominated General Cass, in 1848, but the popularity of General Taylor, and the defection of the New York Barnburners, lost him his election. In 1852, Franklin Pierce's nomination was a southern movement, led off by Virginia; and in 1856, the South took possession of Mr. and his to had him in keeping, soul and body, ever since.

8. Another aggressive movement is now being agitated in the South, which is clearly against the Constitution and the laws. I well know distinguished gentlemen upon this fact, and they have in their places and denied any intent to make this matter a party test, or to repeal the laws which make the foreign slave trade piracy. I give them all the benefits of this disclaimer; yet it is not denied that this is a mooted question in the South. The President, in his recent message, admits that the Wandering brought over one cargo numbering three or four hundred. Again he says: "Those engaged in this unlawful enterprise have been rigorously prosecuted, but not with as much success as their crimes deserved;" an admission which shows a deep sympathy of feeling with the enterprise among the Southern people. If there is a sentiment in the South which operates to prevent the punishment of the pirates engaged in this business, it is easy to perceive how the trafficker can be continued in full bloom, even until the main stem is cut off. If the laws cannot be enforced, there is no occasion for agitating for their repeal; and I understand there has not been a single conviction in any of our southern courts of any person who has been engaged in this nefarious business.

While the people of the free States, in their courts, enforce the fugitive slave law, odious as it is to a large majority of them, the South fails to convict or punish persons engaged in a trade declared by the General Government to be piracy. I leave the country to judge between us.

9. Another clear aggression upon the rights of the free States, a demand for congressional action to fasten slavery upon the people of the Territories against their will. Mr. Buchanan, in his message, the mouthpiece of his party, now owned and controlled by southern men, said:

"I cordially congratulate you upon the final settlement by Congress of a demand for congressional action on slavery in the Territories, which had presented an aspect so fully formidable at the commencement of my Administration. It has been established that every citizen can take his property of any kind, including slaves, into the common Territories belonging equally to all the States of the Union, and to have it protected there under the Federal Constitution. Neither Congress nor a Territorial Legislature nor any human power has any authority to annul or impair this vested right."

And here I wish to call the attention of the country to the facts here assumed—that the court has settled this question—that the Constitution protects slavery in the Territories, and that "neither Congress nor a Territorial Legislature, nor any human power has any authority to annul or impair this vested right." This is Democracy in 1860. One would think, by analogy of reasoning, that if there is no "human power" on earth that can even "impair" the right of a slaveholder to his slave property in the Territories, that ought to be the case with him, yet the South, through Federal legislation to compel the free white laborers in the Territories into a servile submission—to kiss the hand that strikes down their capital, and degrades them to the condition of menial slaves.

A great leader in the Democratic party, I mean Senator Iverson, of Georgia, in a speech in the Senate a few weeks since, said:

"He believed, and the southern people believed, that under the Constitution they had a right to emigrate in any form, and to take their slave property with them; that they have a right to the protection of the law in the enjoyment of that property, and Congress has the power to give that protection."—See APPENDIX, page 10.

We have here an authentic exposition of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. We now understand what the Democratic party mean when they say that "the people of a Territory should be left exactly free to form their own domestic institutions," the Constitution of the United States, first, establishes slavery in the Territories; and second, that Congress should enact a code placing ropes around the necks of the citizens of a Territory opposed to it, thereby degrading free white labor to the same level with African slave labor. Not only does the South, through its authorized agent, the so-called Democratic party, claim the right to carry slaves into all the Territories of the United States, and there hold them by judicial construction; but it demands congressional intervention, by which the iron heel of despotism shall be fastened upon the necks of all persons therein opposed to the institution—a despotism which prevents any attempt, on their part, through their Territorial Legislature or otherwise, to rid themselves of what they believe a positive evil. If the Constitution, which is the basis of all persons there, establishes slavery in the Territories, it only needs such a code as is now demanded by the South to make slaves of the whites. I know that some of our Democratic friends in the free States protest against this interpretation of the Kansas-Nebraska act; but their protest will avail them nothing. Have they not protested before? Did they not protest against the repeal of the Missouri restriction, and then came in? Did they not protest against the Lecompton bill? And have they not come back to the camp and endorsed those who voted for it?—See APPENDIX, page 10.

10. A fourth charge I have against the South is, the violation of article four, section two, of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all private and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Also, of article five of the amendments to the Constitution, which expressly provides, that:

"No person" "shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

Under the Constitution, a citizen of Maine on lawful business has a right to travel through any southern State without molestation, provided he interferes with none of the lawful rights of the people of that State. Southern gentlemen travel through the free States, and every where are treated with becoming respect and consideration; they are suffered every where to mingle with the people of the North, enjoying every right possessed by the people they are visiting. Not so with northern men, when traveling in the southern States. There a system of espionage is in operation, exceedingly annoying to the traveler. Strangers from the North, instead of meeting with that generous hospitality which they are always ready, when at home, to extend their southern brethren, are watched, scrutinized, questioned; their baggage is overhauled, their persons searched; and upon mere suspicion are thrust into jail. A mere expression of opinion, inadvertently uttered in some localities, is an unpardonable crime, for which they are visited with the grossest insults. Men, for merely uttering sentiments which have been taught by Jefferson and other southern men, have been dragged into prison, lynched, tarred and feathered, and their lives threatened by infuriated mobs.

I will refer to a few recent cases. The Charleston Mercury, of the 17th of December, says:—"That a man, supposed to be an abolitionist, was dark complexioned, with black hair, and a scar over the left eye, about five feet eleven inches in height, and calling himself Jambury. Rivers was arrested by the police, and taken to the common carrier, tarred and feathered, and the right side of his head shaved."

A few weeks ago an Irishman who had been naturalized, and had also a vote under Democratic ticket, as he says, a citizen of Pennsylvania, while at work on the State capital at Charleston, South Carolina, not in the hearing of slaves or any black man, but to his associate laborers, uttered sentiments not considered exactly orthodox; for which he was caught up, put in jail, stripped of his nine shillings, put upon his bare back; a bucket of tar poured upon him, and feathers applied. He was then allowed a pair of pants, and, after being imprisoned a further length of time, was put on board the cars for New York, where he arrived, and related the foregoing particulars.

A clergyman, one of the most respectable citizens of Connecticut, a bookseller, was arrested in one of the southern States a short time since; and, on suspicion, without a shadow of evidence against him, was arrested, put in jail, stripped of his nine shillings, and, on the interference of some of the citizens of his State was finally liberated; but not until he had received sufficient abuse to make him a maniac. During a speech in this House by an honorable member from Georgia, [Mr. CALDWELL], on the 15th of December last, the following colloquy took place:

"Mr. CALDWELL. Brecher said that he would preach the same doctrine in Virginia as in Massachusetts. Brown says: 'Brecher, why don't you come and do it?' I ask you why you do not do it?"

"Mr. KILGORE. I will answer the gentleman if he will permit me. I will tell the gentleman why Mr. Brecher would not preach Virginia, because he is a man who is denied in the South; and if he were to go there he would get a coat of tar and feathers."

"Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, but not only would he be denied liberty of speech, but he would be denied personal liberty also, and would be hung higher than Haman."

Not only is Brecher threatened with stripes and imprisonment if he goes South, but the distinguished Senator from New York is threatened with the halter if he is ever found in that quarter. An honorable member from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS], in a speech on the 8th of December last, is reported in the Globe to have said:

"Virginia has arrested, and has hung the traitor Brown, and will hang the traitor Seward if he is found in her border. [Laughter.]"

Now I put it to our southern friends, when you and we both live under the same Democratic constitution which declares, "That the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," whether these things are not unjust toward the people of the free States? Not only are the citizens of the North threatened with stripes, imprisonment, and death, if we visit the southern States, and that under the summary process of mob law, but, from certain recent indications, peaceable, unoffending citizens in the South are to be driven out by unlawful violence, and their overt acts—not for anything they have done; but merely for entertaining opinions held by Wash-

In one of the most eloquent speeches that ever I read, the Hon. James McDowell, jr., afterwards Governor of Virginia and a distinguished member of Congress, said:

"It has been frankly and unquestionably declared, from the very commencement of this country, that the decided enemies of abolition themselves are in such a position, that this property is an 'evil,' and that it is a noxious property. It is, in fact, so dangerous that it is to be removed from those who desire to retain it, that we have been reproached for speaking of it, otherwise than in denigrating and, if reproached, not entering debate upon it in this hall."

Hon. Charles J. Faulkner, just appointed by Mr. Buchanan to the French mission, in a speech in the Virginia House of Delegates, January 20, 1853, in speaking of the slave population in that State, said:

"Sir, to the eye of the statesman as to the eye of Omnipotence, dangers pressing, and dangers that need incessant care, are alike present. The slave population of Virginia now with the elements of destruction reposing quietly upon her bosom, and Virginia lighted from the extremity to the other with the torch of servile insurrection and massacre. It is sufficient for him that the match is not yet applied. It is enough that the embers are there, and that the match will be applied."

I speak not of these things to reproach Virginia, but adduce them as facts worthy of serious consideration; facts not only admitted but proved by some of Virginia's most distinguished statesmen. I will repeat what has been said so many times before, that the Republic of the United States of America is opposed to any and all measures which tend to disturb the domestic relations between master and slave in those States where it lawfully exists; at the same time they are in favor of all constitutional, lawful measures which will prevent its extension new and forever.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in reply to the threats of disunion which have so often been made on the Democratic side of this House, and I trust to the country at large. The fact, that should go out to the country, that all political organizations in this House, excepting the Democratic party, are willing to unite upon broad national grounds for the preservation of the Union. When the time comes for a dissolution of the Union, there are no views to be taken on the subject. The history of the past discloses the fact that the Union has often been threatened before, and as often dissolved; and yet these infatuated columns steadily maintain their places, and instead of States going out of the Union, they have all the time been coming in, until we have a glorious galaxy of thirty-three States. A serious purpose to dissolve the Union involves the grave inquiry, how can it be done? If I understand the theory of those who advocate this doctrine, it is this: that a State in its sovereign capacity, has a right to judge for itself, and determine, independently of the General Government or of the other States, how long it shall remain in the Union; and whenever it determines no longer to remain in the Confederacy, it can peacefully secede. Against this doctrine I enter my solemn protest. For the sake of the argument, if it were true, that the Union was a simple compact between the States, it would require the consent of all the parties to the compact to permit one of its members to go out; hence there could be no such thing as a peaceable dissolution of such Union.

But the States, as independent sovereignties, did not make the Constitution; it was the work of the people, as expressed in the preamble: "We, the people, do ordain and establish this Constitution." Every citizen is a citizen not only of his State, but of the United States; and has a right, under the Federal Constitution, to claim its protection. But how can a State secede the point that they will secede? It can only be done by a majority, acting through its Legislatures or by convention; and in such a case, what becomes of the minority, who are opposed to secession? They cannot be forced out of the Union by majorities, because they are citizens of the United States, and have a right to claim the protection the Constitution affords all its citizens. Again, so far as the several States constituted, as sovereignties, to enter into the Union, there was no right to a right to withdraw. The bond was to be perpetual. Hence it is clear that there can be no such thing as a peaceful secession. The Constitution (article one, section eight) gives Congress the power to provide for the enforcement of the laws of the United States; "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," (in section eight), "and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department, or officer thereof."

The President, before entering upon the execution of his office, is obliged by the Constitution to take an oath or affirmation, that he will, "according to the best of his ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States." (Article two, section one.) The Constitution (article three, section three) gives Congress the power to "declare the punishment of treason;" and they have done it. Any attempt on the part of a State, or any of its citizens, to break up the Union, is rebellion against the laws of Congress, and against the Constitution, and "levying war against the United States," which the Constitution, in the same article, declares to be "treason." In such an event, it would be the duty of the President of the United States, by use of his oath and the authority with which he is vested by the Constitution, to put down such rebellion, and, if necessary, to use the Army and Navy of the United States, to aid in doing it. And it would be the duty of the Federal courts to punish persons engaged in such overt acts, and, if found guilty, hang them high as Haman. There is no such thing as secession without revolution—the one necessarily involves the other. The people made this Government and established the Constitution, and they can abolish it by revolution, and in no other way. Any other construction of the Constitution would make it a mere rope of sand—a Government liable to fly into fragments at the first movement, with no means to perpetuate its existence or protect itself against domestic violence, insurrection, and treason.

Sir, this Government cost too much blood and treasure to be destroyed upon any slight pretext and any one who attempts such a thing, with three millions of inhabitants, we have, in a little more than seventy years, advanced with giant strides until we have thirty-three powerful States, and about twenty-eight million inhabitants.

Our national domain has increased from eight hundred and twenty thousand six hundred and eighty, to two million nine hundred and thirty-six thousand one hundred and sixty-six square miles. It stretches across the continent from ocean to ocean, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Gulf of Mexico to the frozen regions of the North. Our natural resources are unbounded. Our waving fields not only yield a generous return to the hand of the husbandman, but furnish bread for the world. Our workshops dot every valley and encircle every hill; while the busy hum of machinery sends forth its music from almost every gurgling stream and waterfall. The plant hand of American industry has dugged down into the mine of the earth, developing our vast mineral resources, furnishing not only America, but the world, the precious metals—coal, iron, lead, and other valuable productions lying in the subterranean regions beneath our feet. All over our land, as by the hand of magic, have sprung into being the splendid cities of the interior, mighty in wealth, vast in population, abounding in munera of trade, and the bustle of mercantile life.

Along our coasts, washed by the ebbing and flowing tides of the mighty oceans, may be heard the chiming music of the oars, the creak, and the mallet, plied by the ingenious hands of American mechanics, transferring the rugged oak and the lofty pine into "ships which go down into the sea," to "whiten every ocean and every shore with their canvas, and visit every port, in the vast circle of the globe. Our institutions of learning, our colleges, our academies, and common schools, travel along pari passu with the advancing wave of a refined American civilization, all over the Western Territory. Our soldiers and daughters there is none too poor to tread the classic halls of lore, or climb the rugged "hills of science." From every part of our land the church spire points away to heaven, and in these same lands, with hands of the God of fathers, is adored and worshipped by their posterity. Our country is bound together by bands of iron, spreading themselves like one vast network in every direction, manifesting apathy, bringing distant cities into one view, and thus, by the thousand, we have stood and the shrill scream of the locomotive are echoed and reechoed wherever the arts of American industry have found a home. Through the instrumentality of American inventive genius thought, with lightning speed, flashes over a thousand miles, making far distant cities next-door neighbors, while New Orleans, Boston, Charleston, and Chicago tip their beavers and shake hands before breakfast.

Where is the American citizen that can glance his eyes over this young, but mighty western empire—this beautiful island of waving to tyrants and despots in the old world—this land, where the hand of honest toil and industry reaps a sure reward, without patriotic emotions and national pride? Who can gaze upon the stars and stripes, and the beautiful marble of the White House, and not fold our brave countrymen from every section have fought the battles of a common country—and then indulge in a desire to strike it down, and trull it in the dust? We gaze upon these lofty domes, colossal pillars, and marble columns; we view these standing evidences of national wealth and greatness—then turn away to inquire, where is the American citizen that is ready to strike them down a heap of ruins? Our country in the midst of the beautiful marble of the White House, its storms. "Clouds and darkness" have sometimes hung low over our political horizon; the lightning's flash, and hoarse, muttering thunder forbode the coming storm; yet they have passed away by the beautiful marble of the White House, leaving the patriot's heart with bright visions of promise and hope. Shall we, instead of learning wisdom from the past, and in God's good time correcting the evils in the Union, rush madly out to sea?

We talk of disunion; and yet how can we do it without waking up the memories of the past? Comes there not a voice from the sequestered shade of Mount Vernon, rolling over the waters of the Potomac in triumph, and exclaiming: "Stay the rude hand already uplifted to disturb the peaceful repose of the mighty dead and desecrate the quiet home of the sleeping hero?" Will you visit that hallowed spot, just rescued from the destroying fire, and gaze with benevolence and admiration on the American nation, and daughters from the North, the South, and East, and the West, with the faithful torch-light of civil war? Shall American citizens fight over the bones of the immortal George Washington, under the very shadow of Banker Hill monument, or rush madly out to sea, to the sacred relics entombed at Monticello? Will they invade the peaceful retreats that surround the tombstone which marks the final resting place of Ashland illustrious departed statesman, or sound the direful strain of civil war over the grave of Jackson, or insult the ashes of the old hero of the Hermitage? Have we quite forgotten Banker Hill and Trenton, Saratoga and Yorktown?

But I will indulge in no dry dreary foreboding upon this subject. This mighty Republic has yet fulfilled its manifest destiny. Lives there a man, who owes allegiance to American soil, who would hazard the experiment? Roll out your rattling car of disunion from its black Democratic channel, and let it go to the bottom of the sea. Let the car of disunion, with habilitations suited with human gore, drawn from the veins of our own brethren. Mount her upon your clanking cart wheels; drive her, with all the pogeneity of an eastern monarch, through the length and breadth of the Union; everywhere exhibit her bloody hands; her eyes lit up by the fire of hell; her teeth clattering with horrid grinnings, frightful even to the king of terrors himself; then call upon the American people to fall down and worship in her image; you say that you will do this, and then you go forth to worship at her shrine? Just as soon would they cast their bodies before the merciful wheels of a Hindoo juggernaut, as pay homage to such an idol.

Sir, sir, the American people love and reverence the Union; and in a spirit of true patriotism, will they cheerfully endure the ills that are in it until they can be corrected, rather than aid in its destruction.

If the time shall come when the black flag of disunion shall be unfurled; when the tocsin of civil war, domestic strife, and servile insurrection, shall be sounded, when American hands, guided by the lawlessness of treason, shall be rubbed into the American Union; then, from the North and the South, the East and the West; from every hill and valley; from the snow-capped mountains of the North, the sunny fields of the South, and wide-extended prairies of the West, men of brave hearts and strong hands will be seen flocking around one common standard; with steady step and solid columns advancing, shoulder to shoulder, in defense of the CONSTITUTION and the Union; fighting for their homes and freedoms; rallying to the old battle-cry of our fathers, one DESTINY, ONE COUNTRY! INDEPENDENCE NOW, AND INDEPENDENCE FOREVER!

Mr. KELLOGG, of Illinois, obtained the floor for Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, the CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KELLOGG, of Illinois. I will yield if the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to go on this evening.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I should like to occupy the attention of the committee for a short time this evening.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Illinois. Then I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, three months have elapsed since we assembled in this Hall. Amidst all the excitement which has existed, the members with whom I act have preserved a commendable silence, believing, as they did, that as business before the election of a Speaker was in order, and the House was organized. I will not review the scenes exhibited during the struggle for the election of a Speaker. I will not expose, in all their enormity, the hissing threats of denunciation which proceeded from the lips of gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House. I have no heart, Mr. Chairman, to undertake such a work, and would not even recall them, did I not consider it important that the people should understand the purposes entertained by the distinguished leaders of the Democratic party. They thought it was in their interest, very unwisely. If intended to prevent the election of a President who has respect for and sympathy with the interests of the free white laboring man, they will be powerless; for the people of this country know their interests, and will protect them. Let us turn our eyes inward, then, under tremendous threats of destroying the Government.

The people have always maintained, and will always maintain, the right of the majority to rule. In disregard of all this bluster, and in violation of the Republican party will, in convention, nominate a candidate, elect him if possible, and as surely install him in office as he is elected. They will not brag nor swagger about it. They do not now use the language of defiance. But they will permit no dictation of interested parties to swerve them from their purpose, or nullify the popular will. It is a slander upon the Republican party to say that they have any design against the persons or property of our southern neighbors. They are Union-loving men, and will stand by the Constitution and the laws. When they will carefully avoid attacking others, they will resist aggressions upon their rights, come they from what quarter they may. To anticipate the reverse, is in one case to charge them with perfidy, in the other with cowardice, both foreign to the character of our American citizen.

But, Mr. Chairman, I did not rise to discuss any of these topics, believing, as I do, that this Union will not be dissolved, let who may be elected President, but will continue to grow and prosper until it shall encompass the laws. What, then, is my purpose is to direct the attention of the House to the revenue policy of the Government, and to suggest what, in my opinion, will tend more than anything else to strengthen the bonds of this Union.

Mr. Chairman, the Government must be supported by revenue, which the people, in some way or other, must pay. Now, to make these contributions most equitable, least burdensome, and most beneficial to the entire community, and have their proceeds placed in the Treasury at the smallest expense, should be the object of the statesman.

Whether the revenue be raised by taxing imports, or by direct taxation, are grave questions. As the legitimate result of free trade would lead to the taxation of imports, it is well to examine, in doing so, I will refer to the doctrine laid down in the Cincinnati platform on this subject, which is as follows:

Resolved, That there are questions connected with the foreign policy of the country which are inferior to no domestic question whatever. The time has come for the people of the United States to decide whether they will have a free and unobscured trade throughout the world; and, by solemn manifestations, to place their moral influence at the side of their successful example.

How far the Cincinnati platform may be considered authority with the Democracy, it is not for me to say. The ambiguity of its terms has caused endless disputes and dissensions, whilst a strict adherence to its doctrines has caused many an official his head. But I regret to say that, on this question of protective rates, so far as I have been able to observe, there is a very general acquiescence by that party; and thus the means and manner of supporting the Government are made, or attempted to be made, mere questions of party politics—a coupe to be won by all fair and candid men. So far as I may discuss them, I will endeavor to treat them as questions of political economy, and not of party politics.

We have an extensive country, and greatly diversified interests, all to be governed by the same law. It should, therefore, be so framed as to confer its blessings upon all; or, in other words, and to the prosperity, enterprise, industry, and value of the whole country; to make us wealthy and happy at home; respected, honored, and feared abroad. How can this be done? If I can say anything that will contribute to produce this result, my purpose will be accomplished. I will, at least, give my views upon what I consider equal in importance to any subject that will engage the attention of the present Congress.

We buy too much from abroad; and, I was going to say, sell too little; but I will not say that. We sell enough, perhaps too much; for it would greatly enhance our wealth and prosperity if we consumed our products at home, instead of sending them abroad to feed foreign labor, and then buy the product of that labor in the shape of manufactured articles, as I will endeavor to show more fully hereafter.

There has been much discussion and variety of opinion on the subject of a protective tariff, or a revenue tariff. A great difference of terms, the opponents of protection have, until recently, favored a revenue tariff, with discriminations in favor of the manufacturers of our own country. It matters not what name a tariff is called—call it what you will; but it does matter what its principles should be such as to add to the prosperity and happiness of the people.

Providence has dealt most bountifully with us as a nation and a people. We have great agricultural resources, mineral wealth of all kinds, and in immense quantities. Commerce has spread her wings from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and that upon our navigable rivers and lakes has no parallel on the face of the globe. Our free and liberal form of government is inviting to the great emigration of the world; and having the means to feed and support them, the material upon which to employ their labor, why should we not make the most of our own resources, and become the wealthiest, the happiest, and the greatest nation on the earth?

Why should we permit so huge a record to be laid before this House as that exhibited by the financial report now on your table. I say, sir, it is the result of bad legislation—miscellaneous legislation; legislation to foster and protect the manufacturers, laborers, farmers, and artisans of other countries, whilst you bring ruin, distress, and starvation upon the same classes at home. What is it? Why, here it is, sir:

Total imports, exclusive of specie	$250,268,427
Total exports, except specie	$202,964,378
	$47,304,049

Yes, sir, the balance of trade against us to the amount of $47,304,049, and that paid by draining our precious metals (which are the heart's blood of a nation) from us, at a rate equal to the output of the California mines. It requires no prophetic vision to see that this must lead to national bankruptcy, and that that point would have been reached ere this, but for the fortunate discovery of the gold mines in our own territory.

The most humiliating aspect in which this picture can be examined, however, Mr. Chairman, is that presented by the Secretary of the Treasury. We find him highly delighted with the large importations; exulting over the fact that the revenue from that source has exceeded his estimate, and congratulating the country upon this great evidence of prosperity. Why, Mr. Chairman, it reminds me of the fable of the frogs: "Whilst it is sport to you, it is death to us; and as surely in this case, whilst it may be sport to Mr. Cobb, whilst it may for the present bring money into the Treasury, and keep the wheels of Government in motion, it is death to the best interests of the country."

And now, sir, this very fact of the large amount of revenue received from these excessive importations is to be used as an argument against a revision of the tariff. No matter how the country groans and suffers, so that we have revenue to carry on the Government; no matter how little demand there is for labor, how utterly prostrate the manufacturing interests of the country may be, how many thousands of our industrious citizens may be turned idle, and driven to starvation, so that we have money to pay the obligations of the Government, and the expenses of Government, all is well. Away with such doctrines. Out upon such a policy as this. Give us such revenue laws as will foster and protect our own manufactures and give employment to labor at home. And let us have the assurance that we have in such abundance, and that are entirely without value whilst buried in the earth, but by the talismanic touch of labor become gold. Let this labor receive aid and support, by a wise and just policy, and not crush it to the level of the down-trodden foreign labor. Why require protection? is a question frequently asked. Why can you not manufacture iron as cheaply in this country as in England? I answer: it is true, we have the raw material in abundance; we have the requisite skill; we have the improving machinery; and we have the labor; but that labor should be encouraged, and not crushed to the earth. It is the glory of our country that the road to fortune and to fame is open to all, and is traveled by all. We have no special classes or grades here. We frequently find a man who has been engaged by the employer of to-morrow; and this can only be the case when labor is remunerated. We cannot employ labor at the prices paid in the old countries; we should not wish to; and when the day arrives, if it ever should, (which Heaven forbid,) that our labor should be sent abroad to be reduced to the wages paid in foreign countries, then indeed will our glory as a nation have departed.

Let us, on the other hand, encourage home products. Stop this miserable policy of forcing our provisions abroad to find a market, and having them returned to us in the shape of manufactured articles, we paying some sixty or eighty per cent., in addition to their original value, for transportation, &c., to the middle men through whom they have passed; but let us apply our own labor to our own manufactures; let us have the means to feed our own breadstuffs, for the product of our own farmers; supplying ourselves with the manufactured articles; saving transportation, commissions, and various expenses, and feeding and supporting our own labor in preference to foreigners. If the people of this country are to prosper, the country depend upon the number and prosperity of its population, then it follows, as a matter of course, that, by combining manufacturing with agriculture, you can increase the population to the extent that the product of the soil would supply with nourishment; or, in other words, you could employ as large a population in manufacturing and trade as the agricultural productions of the soil would feed, and by this policy you would bring the producer and the consumer together; you would have a market for the farmer, the artisan, who would, in exchange, receive the domestic manufacture instead of the foreign, and thus add to the wealth of our own country by developing its great natural resources.

Why should any portion of our Union object to this policy? The argument is, that the States of the Union are consumers, and not producers of these manufactured articles; hence they must buy as cheap as they can, and sell their own products as dear as possible. Let us examine this. At the formation of our Confederation, when the great experiment of a Republic was about to be tried, provided by the treaty of Ghent, for negroes carried off by the British troops in the war of 1812; the petition of Mary A. Wise, of Virginia, praying compensation for a negro taken by the British in 1814, out of the fund provided by the treaty of Ghent for the payment of such losses; and the petition of the son and heir of Edward Rude, praying compensation for slaves carried off by the enemy during the last war with Great Britain, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 239) for the relief of W. K. Jennings and others. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to lie printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of F. E. Haasler, administrator of the late F. R. Haasler, superintendent of the coast survey and the works for the construction of standards of weight and measure, praying remuneration for losses and expenses incurred by his father, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 21) in relation to the Louisville and Portland canal, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 6) authorizing the enlargement and construction of a branch of the Louisville and Portland canal, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. POWELL, I move that the resolution reported by the Senator from Delaware, on the subject of the Louisville and Portland canal, be made the special order for Wednesday next, at two o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MALLOY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Daniel B. Martin, praying compensation for the use by the Government of his private vertical tubular boiler, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

AGATHA O'BRIEN.

Mr. DAVIS. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Agatha O'Brien, widow of Brevet Major J. P. O'Brien, praying that the amount charged against him on the books of the Treasury as assistant quartermaster may be canceled, and that she may be allowed the amount of pay found due him as captain of artillery, have instructed me to make a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 260) for her relief; and if it be the pleasure of the Senate, I would ask the present consideration of the bill. It is for the adjustment of the accounts of a deceased officer.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 260) for the relief of Mrs. Agatha O'Brien, widow of Brevet Major J. P. O'Brien, late of the United States Army, was read by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to her such sums as may be found due to her late husband as captain of artillery, from the 31st of December, 1847, when he was last paid, to the 31st of March, 1855, the day of the death of her husband, on the books of the Treasury be balanced.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. GRIMES gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill providing for the retrocession of the District of Columbia to the State of Maryland, and for the removal of the capital of the United States from the city of Washington to some other more central and convenient place.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CRITTENDEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 257) further to amend an act to ascertain and settle private land claims in California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

POINT COUPEE PARISH.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill with a view to its present passage, which has been prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, for the purpose of quieting the title to two tracts of land belonging to the parish of Point Coupee, Louisiana, and occupied by that parish for a court-house and Catholic place of worship and cemetery. The bill has been drawn up by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and I trust there will be no objection to its passage now. The bill speaks for itself; it is a single section.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce the bill (S. No. 258) to grant to the parish of Point Coupee, Louisiana, certain tracts of land in the parish of the General Land Office, and I trust there will be no objection to its passage now. It provides that the tracts of land in that parish which have been in ancient occupancy as the site of a church and court-house, and which are designated on the plates of the public surveys as sections twenty-four and twenty-five, township four south, of range ten east, in the southeastern district of Louisiana, shall be granted to the parish, on condition that section twenty-four, or the church site, shall be held by the parish for the use of the Catholic congregation now occupying for public worship and as a burial-ground; but not to the prejudice of an adverse right, if such exist.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to ask the honorable Senators from Louisiana whether the bill comes from the Committee on Private Land Claims, or is now introduced by himself?

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is now introduced. As I stated to the Senate, it has been drawn up at the Land Office. The court-house and the Catholic church and burial-ground, in that parish, are situated upon two tracts of land embraced in the bill, and have been so from time immemorial. The titles are lost; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, at my request, drew up the bill to quiet the title to the parish to those tracts of land is conferred on the ground of ancient occupancy, and reserving the rights of any third person that may have any title to the land. I have the letter of the Commissioner here. The bill states the facts on its face. There are no papers, and can be none if it be sent to the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to the passage of the bill; only it seemed to me to be rather a loose practice to grant title to the land on the basis of ancient occupancy, without subjecting the examination of a committee. However, if it is satisfactory to the Senator from Louisiana, I shall certainly waive any objection I might have to it under the circumstances.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. HAYES, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (No. 44) confirming certain land entries under the third section of the act of 3d March, 1855, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1856," in which the concurrence of the Senate is desired.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 26) to extend the provisions of "An act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits," to Minnesota and Oregon, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had ordered this day the printing of the following documents:

Letter of the Postmaster General, communicating reports of his inspection and detection from the office of mail contractors for the preceding year—ordered at twelve o'clock and twenty minutes.

Letter of the Superintendent of Public Printing, communicating estimates for deficiencies for printing, binding, and lithographing—ordered at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes.

Resolutions of the Legislature of California, asking mail facilities for the northern part of that State—ordered at twelve o'clock and fourteen minutes.

Resolutions of the Legislature of California, asking the establishment of a Sunday mail from San Francisco to Sacramento—ordered at twelve o'clock and fifteen minutes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will call up, at this hour, what he understands is the unfinished business of yesterday—the Military Academy bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. I took the floor upon a subject which was under consideration yesterday with the intent to speak upon it to-day, and with the understanding that I was to do so. I supposed, as the subject was considered before this one yesterday, it would stand before it if they were postponed until to-day; and the motion to postpone took that form. I may not have taken exactly the right form to effect my purpose; but that was my desire, and that was my expectation.

Mr. WIGFALL. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment? I believe I have as much interest in the bill which comes up as unfinished business as anybody; but I have no objection at all to waiting the precedence of this bill until the Senator concludes his speech; hoping, after he has delivered his speech, that he and his friends will leave us at least with a quorum, in order to consider other matters when they come up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Upon what resolutions does the Senator from Vermont desire to speak?

Mr. COLLAMER. The resolutions of the Senators from Louisiana. [Mr. BROWN.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved and seconded to postpone the unfinished business and all other orders, with a view to take up the resolutions of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WIGFALL. Is it understood that, after the Senator has concluded his speech, the bill which comes up as the unfinished business of yesterday will be taken up in its regular order?

Mr. COLLAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIGFALL. With that understanding, of course I give way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It must be put in the form of a motion. Things may take such a form that the Chair cannot call it up. If the understanding is that it is laid aside temporarily until the Senator from Vermont concludes his speech, then the Chair would call it up after he has concluded.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that will be considered as the understanding.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I understand the object is to give an opportunity to the Senator from Tennessee to report, so that this proposition will be postponed informally.

Mr. GWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Then this bill—the Military Academy bill—is considered by the President as the unfinished business of yesterday, and therefore before the Senate. I understand the motion made yesterday to be to postpone the bill until to-morrow, for the purpose of having the message and accompanying documents printed.

That motion, I understand, was agreed to; but it is not material. I do not understand, however, that that motion left it as the unfinished business before the Senate. There is a special order that comes up at half past one o'clock to-day; but for the purpose of accommodating the two contesting parties, as I hope they will get through to-day, I desire to move that the bill which I think will be acceptable to all, I move that the homestead bill be made the special order for half past one o'clock on Tuesday next. That will relieve the present difficulty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Tennessee that the homestead bill is the special order for half past one o'clock to-day. The present occupant was not in the Chair when the Senate adjourned yesterday, and he found another bill on his table, marked "unfinished business." The Senator from Tennessee moves that the homestead bill be postponed until Tuesday next, at half past one o'clock, and that it be made the special order for that hour.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senate should either abandon the Calendar entirely and rely upon special orders, or put some special order in its place, to advantage to report a bill early in the session, if it is to be postponed from day to day, and week to week, by special orders. If the Senate prefer, however, to proceed in the manner of special orders entirely, and not rely on the Calendar, I am willing to give my change in this way too.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am very glad that the Senator from Mississippi has called able or general extent, it was, though somewhat modified in Mississippi and Orleans Territories, suffered to remain. The fact that it had been taken there and existed there was deemed an indication of its adaptation and local utility. Where slavery did not in fact exist to any appreciable extent, it was by Congress expressly prohibited, so that in either case the slave supply without any difficulty or doubt as to the character of its institutions. In no instance was this difficult or disturbing question left to the people who might settle in the Territories, to be there an everlasting bone of contention as long as the territorial government existed. It was regarded as a subject in which the whole country had an interest, and therefore improper for local legislation.

To illustrate this, I will not go with the history of governmental action from time to time, as Congress made different territorial governments in the country northwest of the Ohio. I need not show how they continued to repeat over and over again the utter prohibition of slavery; but I will call attention to the act which has been remarked upon by the Senator from Georgia, in relation to Mississippi. As to Kentucky, I do not know that North Carolina, in making the cession of the territory to the United States, prohibited them from doing anything tending to the abolition of slavery. In relation to Mississippi, I do not understand the action of Congress exactly, but I think it was so. Congress presented it. The truth is that the United States claimed a large part of that country, now forming Alabama and Mississippi, and Georgia claimed nearly the whole of it. When the Mississippi territorial act was passed, in 1798, it was framed in anticipation of and it appointed a board of fixing commissioners for the settlement of that dispute with Georgia. The territory was settled, as far as it was settled, with slaveholders and slaves. It was expected that Georgia, in making her cession, would do as North Carolina had done in relation to Kentucky. The territorial act of 1798 remained unexecuted until 1802. In 1802, the commissioners of Georgia made settlement with the United States, and then the United States agreed to pay Georgia $1,250,000, for which she quitclaimed all her right, claims, and title, with certain reservations; and amongst other things, she put in a clause forbidding the extension of the anti-slavery clause of the ordinance of 1787 over that territory. They made their grant on that condition.

What does that show? The Senator from Georgia says:

"It is 1798, when Congress legislated in relation to Mississippi Territory, they did not prohibit slavery."

No, sir, it was already there; actually established, and it was expected that Georgia would insist on keeping it there, and she did insist on keeping it there. But that was not all. The United States then, in that very act, prohibited the importation of slaves from abroad, though they could not prohibit it in the rest of the United States until 1808. By what power did Congress do that? Certainly they received no power for it from the provision of the Constitution that "no State shall enter into any such compact as may be so interpreted as to annul the obligation of this compact as to any person as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808." That did not give them any power about it except to prohibit in all the States after 1808; but they did proceed to prohibit the introduction of the slave into the Mississippi Territory in 1798. Why? Simply for the same reason that they did the rest: they considered themselves as possessing the power, in framing territorial governments, to frame them in such a way, and with such prohibitions and conditions, as they thought would best promote the interests of the nation. They derived the power, no doubt, at that time, from that clause of the Constitution called the territorial clause, by which they were empowered to make all needful rules and regulations for the Territory which they might acquire. There cannot be found a clause in the Constitution which gave them the power, unless it was that. I know that it is said, with regard to Louisiana and other acquisitions obtained by treaty with foreign nations, inasmuch as they have power to acquire, that it has the necessary incidental power to govern; but that cannot apply to Mississippi. It was not acquired by treaty from a foreign nation at all. They exercised the power there under the territorial clause.

Again, when our country purchased the Louisiana purchase from France, in the first act forming the territorial government of Orleans Territory, now Louisiana, which was in 1803 or 1804, Congress did not prohibit slavery, because it was already there, and because it was adapted to the country, I suppose they thought. They suffered it, but they did not leave it so. They provided that no slaves should go in there except in families for settlement; and in the next place, they provided that no slave should be taken up with in any way that had been imported into the United States after 1798. Why 1798? In 1798 they passed that Mississippi act prohibiting the importation of slaves from abroad into Mississippi. They saw, I suppose, that it afforded very little security to keep out imported slaves from Mississippi, when they could be imported into Georgia and taken over into Mississippi. Congress, therefore, provided, in the act for Orleans Territory, that no slave should be taken in there in any way, in families or in any other way, that had been imported after 1798. Now, I would ask, did not the people of South Carolina, or Georgia, or any other slaveholding State—and a great many of them were such at that time—own their slaves which they had imported from Africa in 1800, and 1801, and 1802, and 1803, just before they took the slaves they held? If any of them were property, were not those slaves property? Clearly they were. Well, then, how did Congress have a right to prohibit their taking them into Louisiana? They did not, I suppose, and no man doubted it. It remained for fifty years, and no man questioned it.

It is unnecessary, in order to show what was the power, as then understood by them, that they should, on all occasions, have prohibited slavery entirely. The fact that they did not do that does not show that they had any power to do it. No, Mr. President, a power to regulate is a power to prohibit. Nothing is more fully settled, for instance, than that the power to regulate commerce is a power to prohibit commerce altogether, as was fully settled in relation to the embargo. Such is the power of Congress to regulate the Territories precisely as they pleased. If the contemporary exposition, if the usages and practices, under the Government, by those who made it, and, immediately after its formation, continued and persisted in, uniform in its operation, can prove anything, and in that case they can prove, possible proof, when any doubt exists as to the construction of a paper—then, I say, it is clear Congress had and exercised the power, both in the territory they owned at the time the Constitution was formed, and in that which they acquired afterwards, either from one of the confederated States or from a foreign country. They exercised this power of regulating, curtailing, or prohibiting, as they in their judgment believed to be best for the country.

Such is the tenor of our experience as to how this matter was originally settled. In the progress of affairs, and in thus arranging for the Territories and settling them peaceably, they brought up State after State in perfect peace and success and prosperity until, I believe, fourteen States had been admitted into the Union, and then one-half slave and one half free; they had grown up, under this patronage and this administration of the General Government, in the full exercise of this power. In the progress of this history a difficulty arose in relation to the State of Texas.

We had then a large tract of land utterly unsettled; the settlements in the Louisiana purchase had commenced upon the mouth of the Mississippi, and gradually proceeded up; but a large part of the Territory was entirely a wilderness, and Congress found themselves in difficulty as to the question of slavery and freedom in that Territory. What did they do? It occurred to the mind at once, "it cannot be slaveholding and free territory at the same time; we cannot have it both at once. I can hardly conceive of any resolution of Congress so entirely contrary to itself as to divide it. If two men own a field, and one wants to sow it with oats and the other with wheat, and they cannot have oats and wheat together with any success, I do not know any other way to get along with it peaceably but to divide the field, and let each man be cultivated with one usual advantage. This is an old lesson; it began very early—I have had occasion before to call attention to it, and will again. And Abraham said unto Lot, let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdsmen and thy herdsmen, for we be brethren." "If thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left."

This territory was divided; Missouri was admitted; the line of 36° 30' was run, and it was declared that shall be our division. Was there anything wrong in that? Was there anything so extravagant and extraordinary in that, that we should now go to war with our fathers who made peace among themselves by it? Is not their example worthy of imitation? It certainly is by all those who really desire peace; but by politicians and other men can make themselves capital out of a constant turmoil and trouble, I suppose they will never agree to it.

Now, Mr. President, what is the proposition of the Republican party? Nothing more, nothing less than to restore that line. I do not suppose that those who obliterated it will render any assistance to again drawing it upon the surface of the earth, but that in the proposition, and that is all there is to it; for if we say that slavery shall not go into the Territories, it amounts to that, for there are no Territories for slavery to go into, but what are arranged, as things now are, to any extent, unless it is a constant turmoil and trouble, I suppose they will never agree to it. That is all. Exclusion of slavery from the Territories, and leaving it uninterfered with in the States where it exists, as in the case of Texas, and in the case of Missouri, in my estimation, but practically restoring the compromise, and I shall so call it in my remarks.

There may be other aspects of the question; but really when we dismember it, strip it of its collateral and contingencies, and present it in its naked light, there are but three things to be seen: one of those subjects that call so loudly on all parts of the country, and especially on the South, for expressions of execration of us? It seems to me not. There is not only nothing new in it, but there is nothing of the least apparent injustice in it, which has been once fully agreed to, and I think never should have been disagreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will not interrupt the Senator from Vermont by a question, if it embarrasses him at all in the course of his argument; but I would ask him if he intends referring, in the course of his remarks, to the fact that there is no man living with great interest, to the fact that the whole South endeavored, by every possible means—by remonstrance, entreaty, and every other possible means—to get the gentlemen who now compose the Senate, that which has been once fully agreed to, and I think never should have been disagreed to. Mr. Senator says is what they now want?

Mr. COLLAMER. You mean to extend it to the Pacific?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Yes; to leave that line, not only as a sacred line, as established in 1793, but to extend it to the Pacific, and the proposition now is to put it back, after you have extended the free States south of the line.

Mr. COLLAMER. What do you mean by that? California?

Mr. BENJAMIN. You took possession of a Territory, and then, after you have got that, now you say, restore the line to what it was.

Mr. COLLAMER. If the gentleman will be a little patient, he will find that I shall not blink that point at all; but I do not understand it as he does. I have, however, no desire to do so. I expect to call attention to it, and I think, in my opinion, that line should not have been obliterated. I cannot here but remark, in the first place, as to the making of it. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HENRY] in the course of this session spoke of that as being a northern aggression, and he made a discovery new to me, when he supposed the North made the line. The truth is the South made that line. I do not say that no northern man voted for it. There were a very few, enough, with the southern votes, to make a majority; but I regret to say, that the southern men who made it, and they made it. I actually heard with astonishment the honorable Senator from Virginia put that down as one of the northern aggressions. That is a new discovery to me. To my mind, that is very much like the man of whom I heard a story, who said to me, "I told you that he was willing to go over there and help the Canadians to fight the British any time; and when asked why, he said, 'the British are always pecking at somebody; at one time they came into Boston, and then into New York, and then into New England, and we have not got over that yet.'" [Laughter.] I think this is about as new a reading of history as that. But, sir, what purpose had that compromise line answered? What had the South got out of it? First, the making of that line admitted Missouri; it left Arkansas to be admitted south of it, and left all the country that could be formed into States any where south of 36° 30' to be made slaveholding Territories, and so, of course, slaveholding States. In the next place, the South wanted Texas; we know that for. Undisputed was the object. Mr. Calhoun officially, as Secretary of State, announced to the world that it was to be obtained to perpetuate slavery. There was no dispute about that. They wanted that. How did they get it? One among the means by which they obtained it, was this: they provided that the line of 36° 30' should be continued across Texas. I know it would not give much even if that had been kept. It did not amount to a great deal; but I shall have occasion to refer to that again. What was north of that line in Texas, was acquiesced to the cause of freedom. That was one of the elements that entered into the obtaining of the annexation of Texas. It was one of the means by which they effected that. Afterwards, there was a further growth out of this compromise line, there was never much ground for a claim of Texas to a large quantity of land now forming part of New Mexico, and which was thus sequestered to the cause of freedom, if in Texas. The United States finally gave Texas $10,000,000 to quit-claim all her right to that country, and she gave it up to New Mexico where it would stand a chance of being slave territory, and would not fall within the saving of this clause of the Texas annexation resolutions.

It was not necessary to trace the history of the difficulties which were attempted to be settled, and in some measure were settled, by what were called the compromise measures of 1850; but the great point which was desired to be obtained by the action of that year—professedly desired, and I do not know but really was, that Congress should settle the subject of slavery for all the country we then owned, as the compromise line of 1850 had settled the condition of the country in relation to all we then owned, and the ordinance of 1787 to all we then owned. How was it settled in 1850? It was settled by that Congress, that the compromise line in relation to Utah and New Mexico, and the other compromise measures then agreed upon, there would be no territory left about which to quarrel in relation to the subject of slavery; it would be settled and settled for ever. It was settled, as they said at that time, a finality of that topic. Those compromise measures were passed. They were passed because the Missouri compromise line had settled all the Louisiana purchase, and they took it up there and settled all beyond; and these two standing together made a perfect provision for the whole subject in the whole Union. Thus it was that the Missouri compromise line entered as a very large element into the formation of the compromise measure of 1850, and was the basis of the settlement of that settlement was in relation to a larger and more important part of the country than the other.

By means of this compromise line, the South had, from step to step, as I have stated, obtained these several advantages; and what do we come to now? This bill operates as a sort of a stock-pigeon, a decoy, to enable them to go on, step after step, with these various arrangements as they wanted. It quieted the North; it enabled them to obtain from the North these various acquiescences. But, sir, when they had gotten them all through; when there was no more expectation of obtaining anything south of the line; when they had secured every advantage it was practicable to have from it, now they must just at once take down the stool-pigeon, destroy this decoy, obliterate the line, and assert their peculiar institution as much north of it as they could. That was attempted to be done in 1854, by the legislation of that year.

Now I come to the point that the Senator from Louisiana suggests. Why we will not compromise repeated. Why was that line obliterated? I would like to say; that the more excuse a man makes for a thing, the less we are satisfied with it. A good excuse or reason is perfect in itself; it is not made by collecting together half a dozen improbable, and even untrue, reasons, and saying that what are said to be the causes of that obliteration. First, we are told by the honorable Senator from Louisiana that the North were unfaithful to the agreement. I know the honorable Senator from Louisiana in putting the question, does not use those terms; but they are the terms that are attempted to be used in presenting this proposition to the community; that the North were unfaithful and untrue to that Missouri compromise line. What was the compromise line, being true and faithful to a compact? What is meant by it in the English language? I take it, it is the carrying out and executing the compact according to its terms, according to the understanding of it when it was made. What was the understanding when the compromise line was made? It was made in 1820? It was to run through the French purchase—the Louisiana purchase, if you please—from the Mississippi river to the Rocky Mountains. Had not that always been carried out until it was repealed? What had ever the northern people done that was untrue to that compact? Nothing, nothing. Nothing is pretended. Then that pretended excuse is unfounded. The allegation that they had been untrue to it themselves is simply untrue.

It is also said that they would not vote to extend it after the Mexican war and our obtaining from Mexico territory towards the Pacific. It is said they would not consent to extend that same line through to the Pacific. In relation to that point, I say, first, it is no matter what their reason was for it; but that there was any such obligation on them to make another bargain and extend it over other country. It never was any part of the original compact that it was to be extended over other territory; and therefore it is a matter of no use of instances when they say that that action was. I was not present at the time those gentlemen objected to that. I am not possessed of what their true reasons were. I do not think they needed any. When one man proposes to another to enter into a compact, he has simply to say, "I do not intend to do that," or "I cannot do it." Very obvious that the gentlemen who represented the free States on that occasion were in a very different condition about that territory, for the country obtained from Mexico had no slavery in it; it had been abolished while the country belonged to Mexico. It is not as if they had any such obligation, and therefore they probably may have thought, though I do not know it, that their constituents would not have approved of their making a bargain to give away and make into slave territory what they had already free, by already free. The gentlemen say they agreed to divide the new Territories that were slaveholding. Very well; you may have been generous on that occasion; that makes no demand on the other side to reciprocate it on a different occasion. But that is not the great difficulty with the thing. Suppose the North, as you say, would not agree to extend that line over the newly acquired territory: what then? You might find fault, if you pleased; perhaps you would have occasion to do so; I do not say that. But, sir, if you would or would not, that sort of excuse can be a man of common discretion make to another of a similar character, to say, "Sir, because you will not make this other additional bargain, I will break up the one I made myself." That is what you did do. You repealed the Missouri compromise line in the country covered by the Louisiana purchase, for which it was made, and to which it was confined. To my mind this is rather a lame excuse; in short, it is no excuse at all; but it is said that that was the reason why it was repealed.

The next reason is the one which is put into the repealing bill. That bill, called the Kansas-Nebraska act, which repealed the eighth section of the Missouri act, does not say that it was repealed for any such cause as that which I have just noticed. It says that it was to be declared null and void; because it was inconsistent with the principles of the compromise acts of 1850. That is the reason given in the bill. I am merely say, that those who passed it put on the record that that is the reason, and it is—I will not give it any other reason, but that is the reason. I do not resort to any other reason when he has recorded the one which he gave at the time; he is estopped from giving any others. That is an entirely different reason, and utterly inconsistent with the first reason, when they are both put on the record. Now, though it was put on record that I was in consistent with the compromise of 1850, is just as wrong as the other. The fact is, that compromise of 1850 was made on the ground that the former one of 1820 was part and parcel of the agreement; and therefore this excuse is equally unfounded with the other.

But, Mr. President, I have now attended to three reasons for the repeal. The gentleman from Virginia found fault with the compromise of 1850, because, he said, the North made it, and it was an aggression when it was made. The next reason that is given is, that they would not extend it. The third reason is the one put into the bill, that it was contrary to the compromise of 1850; but we have this session, and perhaps within a short period before, got another reason. It is said that it is unconstitutional; that Congress was well justified in repealing it, because it was unconstitutional.

Mr. WIGFALL. With the consent of the Senator, I will ask a question. I do not want to protract this debate, because I have a little matter that I want to get up after it is over; but, just as a matter of curiosity, I should like to know what the Senator understands to have been the principle of the compromise of 1850 as to Utah and New Mexico?

Mr. COLLAMER. It was this: there had been difficulties and controversies about the forming of territorial governments in those Territories. Congress could not agree on it. At first we had California in with them—

Mr. WIGFALL. Leave California out. Mr. COLLAMER. It was in it, and we cannot help it. It was in it for a year or two, until California formed a State government. Then, when it came to the compromise period of 1850, as part of the compromise, California was added as a State. As to Utah and New Mexico, there had been bills, especially for New Mexico, pending in Congress before that. Various measures had been proposed in relation to them; the northern people insisting on the application of the provision of the other side, and the southern side, as they should never exist there. They would not pass them without it. "When Congress passed them, they were passed without that, and with a provision that the people might make them free or slave States, and that they should be admitted as they should be formed, whenever they should become States."

Mr. WIGFALL. That was the principle? Mr. COLLAMER. That was the provision in relation to them.

Mr. WIGFALL. That the Territories should settle it for themselves; and that Congress should not, in the meantime, interfere to prohibit the introduction of slavery?

Mr. COLLAMER. No, sir. When the gentleman says the Territories should settle it for themselves, he includes more than I understand it—

Mr. WIGFALL. I am not a squatter-southern man.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is a point you have got in that was not put in. It was put in in relation to Nebraska and Kansas; but it was not put in in relation to the others.

Mr. WIGFALL. Did they not have the right to regulate their own affairs, without any intervention of Congress as to slavery?

Mr. COLLAMER. There was nothing said about that.

Mr. WIGFALL. Was there any interposition on the part of Congress, either to establish or prohibit slavery there?

Mr. COLLAMER. There was none.

Mr. WIGFALL. Then the principle, if there was any principle involved in the Utah and New Mexico bills, was, that Congress should not legislate either to establish or protect—

Mr. COLLAMER. You are drawing a conclusion.

Mr. WIGFALL. I am asking for information.

Mr. COLLAMER. The bills are very plain.

Mr. WIGFALL. These are historical facts; only philosophers can give reasons. I was asking for a reason, possibly; but I want the Senator, before he comes to the point, to say that you are a new Senator yet, and do not understand these questions. Now, I understand—at least before I got here I had supposed that the Utah and New Mexico bills left this question beyond all doubt; that Congress did not, in these bills, interfere for or against slavery. Is that true, or is it not?

Mr. COLLAMER. I have stated about that. There had been a difficulty in forming those territorial governments, because a part of the country insisted on putting in the ordinance of 1787.

Mr. WIGFALL. Yes, sir.
Mr. COLLAMER. Congress could not agree to it; but when they had the making of the compromise of 1850, as part and parcel of it, these two Territories had territorial acts passed for them, which will speak for themselves, but they were passed without the prohibition of the ordinance of 1787.

Mr. WIGFALL. Precisely. Then I want to ask the Senator, when you come to form a new territorial bill as to Kansas and Nebraska, if you are not following out the precedent? I do not talk about the principle spoken of in the great speeches that were circulated in thousands and hundreds of thousands, but if the precedent was not followed when the Missouri restriction was repealed and the Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed, as the Utah and New Mexico bills were passed, without any provision either favoring or disfavoring slavery? That is the question.

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman has made his own speech, taking his own premises, and drawing his own conclusions. I can present very different views. I think that that whole compromise must be taken together.

Mr. WIGFALL. The omnibus was turned over, and they were passed as separate bills.

Mr. COLLAMER. They were passed as separate bills, but they all constituted a compromise, and are as spokes of in the Nebraska act. It was a compromise consisting of three or four acts passed here. That compromise put together made a whole, and I insist that it was a disintegration and destruction of the principle on which they went when you repealed the compromise line which settled the controversy between the territory, and which settlement entered into and constituted part of the very compromise of 1850.

Mr. WIGFALL. With the permission of the Senator, I will again draw his attention to the fact that the Utah and New Mexico bills were passed without any provision that established the prohibiting slavery, and that the Kansas-Nebraska bill, in order to be passed in accordance with that precedent, necessarily have repealed the Missouri restriction, or it would have recognized the right of Congress to interfere. I am sure that the Senator, without non-interposition, I call interposition. What he would call non-interposition, I call interposition. As there had previously passed a bill in 1830—

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman is making a speech of his own; by his own make a question. He is making up his own logic, stating his premises, and drawing his conclusions in his own way. I say all the parts of that compromise constitute a whole. They should be left to stand together, and I have already explained what I considered entered into and constituted a part of it. Now gentlemen say that when they came to pass a law making a territorial government for Kansas and Nebraska, they had to pass it like those for which they had a precedent. How was there any obligation on them to establish the same in the world. If a man had sold land for ten dollars an acre, a large tract, and should afterwards sell a similar amount to the same purchaser for twenty dollars, could he then say, "now you must give me twenty dollars for the first?" They had made arrangements all about that line before the compromise was made on that basis; and now, when they came to make a territorial government, were they obliged to make it on the basis of the Utah act, passed since the line was arranged?

I was stating that the law was attempted to be given for that repeal. The first, mentioned here by the Senator from Virginia, was that the North made it, and that it was an aggression; the second was, that it was not extended over other territories, but a new bargain made for them; the third was, that it was the result of the compromise of 1850; and the fourth is, that it was unconstitutional all the while. To my mind, this last is pretty much like Jack Falstaff's, "I knew you all the while." It is an after-thought, a new one. It is possible that these gentlemen can give that as an excuse for doing the thing which they did not explain it or state it at the time they did it?

Again, is it becoming in these people to say,

"We agreed to this proposition; we made this arrangement with you in 1830; we have had our States admitted south of the line, according to it; we have had the consideration on our part, and now we turn around on you, and tell you we never had any authority to make it, and we are now free to do as we please. We did it was a great delusion from beginning to end?" The truth is, that, in common ethics, as well as in law, when a man exercises the power to do a thing, he is estopped from saying he had not the power. If a man says to a horse, as his horse, and afterwards, after taking his pay, tell me that the horse belonged to another man. He has no right to say it; he is estopped from saying it. So with those who exercised this power. They are not at liberty, in law or in morality, to say that they had not the right to do it. It is totally immaterial whether they had the power or had not the power. With them, it should be held sacred; for they did it.

But, Mr. President, I have been unable to see what was the difficulty in this compromise line being constitutional. Was it unconstitutional because it was not long enough? Is it possible for you to say that if it had been extended to the Pacific it would have been a good and constitutional one? Here stands the honorable Senator from Louisiana, an eminent lawyer, a very courteous lawyer, he found, whatever may have been said about the Philadelphia lawyers; but he stands here and puts to me a question implying plainly that the difficulty was, we would not extend the line. Then you were willing to extend it, and forbid the very north of it to the Pacific? Yes. Then how had you a right to do it; or do you mean to acknowledge that you were then trying to play another trick on us? I do not believe anything of this notion; you did not believe it at the time; and I think that it should not be permitted to be made by any man.

But, Mr. President, how has the experiment of the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and the measures which followed it, worked? What was involved in it? What did it propose to do? If the repeal of the Missouri compromise was really declared that, being inconsistent with the principles of the compromise of 1850, that line was thereby declared inoperative and void, but it further went on to provide that Congress would neither legislate slavery into the Territory, nor exclude it therefrom; but that the people thereof should be left perfectly free to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. Why did they put in that last clause? I am very apt to forget it, but I have always supposed that all we made within this nation, whether by a State Legislature or by Congress, were subject to the Constitution as a matter of course. I did not suppose that repeating that could alter the fact. Still, there was a stress laid on that. Some gentlemen, however, in the Senate, and I think that the people were invented with power to regulate this institution in their own way, constitutionally; and yet they voted for that bill, with that expression in it.

The honorable Senator from Virginia said, last week, that he did not see how Congress had power to invade the people of a Territory with the authority of legislating and settling its institutions in their own way under the Constitution; but he agreed to give it to them, subject to the Constitution, thereby subjecting to the opinion of the Congress that was enacted to vote for a law which was, in the opinion of the voter, unconstitutional, in order to leave the question to the courts! Congress did invade the people of the Territory with that power, if they could not be subject to the opinion of the courts, whether they could or not. I cannot but say, though it may be rather a harsh mode of illustrating it, that it is like the French naval officer going into battle, and praying the Lord, if there was one, to save his soul, if he had any. [Laughter.] That was the case with us, when we gave that power to give it; but we do not believe we have any power to give it. That is your position. That was a very different bill from the others.

I know it has been said since, that really and in fact nothing was meant by all that rignarole of words, except that when the people came to form a State constitution, they could make it a free or a slave State, as they pleased. Then, that action was very unnecessary. There is no doubt that if gentlemen desire to make issues for themselves, that is a matter for their consideration. No man can mistake the expressions of that bill; and those expressions were not put in there for any such purpose as is now pretended by some and used by others. That is the vision of the New Mexico and Utah act, wherein it was provided that they should be admitted either with or without slavery, as should be provided in the constitutions when they came to form a State—that very expression was already in the Kansas-Nebraska act, right sections before the other words to which I have alluded. It was all provided for before you came to the repealing provision. That was not there, then, for any such purpose. It evidently does mean, as it provides, that the people there, whether Territory, and as a Territory, should settle the matter in their own way.

I will not enter into the question whether they could or could not; but that was the power given. Were they left to form it in their own way? Certainly not. They were required to call the vote of the very first Territorial Legislature, more than four thousand men under arms from Missouri invaded and subjugated them, and made their election. They never were left free to act in their own way; and then followed the extraordinary means which were resorted to, to call the vote, which resulted, this Government saying that it would not correct anything, and those laws should be carried into effect with the whole power of the Government, together with the ravages of war, and the destruction of property, and the blood which went over Kansas Territory. These all followed your act. Did you think they were worse than other people? What were you attempting to do? You were attempting to have a Territory that should be a slaveholding Territory. The Territory at that time, I think, could not make it go through. In the nature of things it cannot. The people supposed their territorial government was to settle the question. The Missourians went over, and chose the territorial government, and then used every means to settle it. All understood it so at that time. That was an entirely different thing from the New Mexico and Utah bills. That was the experiment attempted.

How has it worked? Is anybody so much satisfied with the results and effects of that experiment that he desires to push it further? I do not believe there are many. The people of the North believe that that was all wrong; in the first place, because it was contrary to the original policy of the Government. In the next place, they do not believe it is beneficial to the country to turn it over to the people, on the plains of Kansas, to fight out a subject of this kind in which the nation is interested. It never was tried before, and I trust will never be tried again.

Mr. President, it is said great danger will result from the action of the Republican party, if they should really apply their principles; if they should reestablish the Missouri compromise line and stop the spread of slavery in the Territories, which the repeal of the line attempted to effect. We proposed to do nothing more and nothing less than restore the Missouri compromise; and if we should carry it out, does not that make a pretty fair division of this country? We have, in round numbers, about one third of our people in the slaveholding States. We have about two thirds of them in the free States. We have about three million square miles, in round numbers. It does not differ a hundred thousand from that. It is very fully shown, from the best evidence and the best information, as collected and collated by Professor Henry Jones, of the State House in Kansas, in his report, in 1856, that there is a little more than one third of this whole country that is inseparable of settlement. We may be unwilling to acknowledge that to ourselves; but that is the fact. As stated by the Senator from Georgia, and which I believe to be true, the slave population is concentrated within their territory, (and they are in the occupancy of eight hundred and fifty thousand square miles,) almost one million of the best part of the country. They are but about one third of the people. There will be left, then, for the other two thirds of the inhabitable part of our country, one million one hundred and fifty thousand square miles. Have they not much the larger part? Have they not got the best part? Can gentlemen any now, when we declare they shall be and ought to be confined to that, as they are trying to smoke them out? It is the other side that is in trouble. The free people, with their institutions, according to numbers, are about to be restricted to less than one proportion of the country, and they are to be driven out or starved out.

What, then, should prevent us from doing this justice? What is there wrong in it? What is there unprecedented in it? What is there unjust in it? Certainly nothing. But still it will cost, they say, to have a Republic, a President chosen; it will be a cause of dissolution. Why? Because they say some of the free States have passed unfriendly laws to that provision of the Constitution about fugitives from labor. Mr. President, in relation to those laws, I would call gentlemen's attention to the fact that it is the exclusive duty and obligation, as well as privilege, of every State to protect the liberties and lives and property of its own citizens. I say it is exclusively their duty within their own territory.

I not very frequently, especially among unlettered people, hear it asked, why Congress cannot abolish slavery? and I cannot but say that I think at times there have been some mistaken notions, like those suggested by the Senator from Texas, about the best of a consolidated Government, and talk of that kind. Take the plainest case imaginable. Here is a man, if you please, in a northern State, confined as a laborer in his own cellar, chained, for years. The whole power of the United States Government cannot afford to free him. There is no power to grant any man freedom in the southern States; no matter how many men they hold in bondage, if you call it such, it is matter exclusively theirs; Congress has no power over it. If they, as some of them do, propose to release a bondman a larger number of men are free, no matter how we may look on it, it is utterly beyond the reach of the power of Congress. So, on the other hand, I take it, the right and duty to protect their own citizens in their liberty and lives is the exclusive duty and privilege of the States.

It was not true, as was properly suggested by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WARE] yesterday, that because the South have a right to pursue and take their slaves that run away, and bring them home, therefore every man in a free State is subject to being taken away. Let us think, for a few moments, of the decisions on that subject. In 1842, came the decision of the Prigg case. That case contained some pretty important things, new to the country at that time. We may have become familiarized with them now; but they called for the action of the States.

The Supreme Court decided in that case that the owner of a fugitive slave had the right to pursue him into a free State, without any process whatever, and take him and recapture him and carry him home. I take it that it is the privilege and duty of every State to so arrange the manner in which a man exercises his rights, that the rights and privileges of others may be secure. That is a matter of legitimate legislation. We have, for instance, in the State in which I live, a considerable number of free colored citizens. I do not know their number now—a thousand, perhaps more. They are just as much entitled to the protection of the laws as the white men. When this opinion was pronounced by the Supreme Court, no person could come there and take away a claiming man as a fugitive slave, and carry him away without any process whatever—for the court said he might do it, if so be that he committed no illegal violence—was it not obvious that our colored population could be in no danger? We do not get up against honest and honorable slaveholders, but against all men who might come to claim themselves as slave dealers? They could not be safe, if there was to be no process, if no court was to pass upon it, if nobody was to interfere with it. If he was to take them this right without any, I do not say without any arrangement or control, how could they be safe? It was very natural, and did happen, as the Senator from Georgia says, that in Vermont they began as early as 1844; yes, sir, two years after that decision. When they understood the decision, they did say, "Now, this will not do. We cannot have our people subjected to this sort of arrest. If these men have the power to arrest him; if they are entitled to a man as a slave, let there be due process; let there be justice to our people some sort of security." Therefore they did provide that the taking of a slave without process should be unlawful—illegal. Was there anything extraordinary in that? Can you see anything extraordinary in that provision of the Constitution? Clearly, not at all.

That case further decided, too, that State magistrates might act under the law of 1793, if they pleased, not otherwise; but if the States forbade it, they could not. They decided another thing: that this subject of the reclaiming of fugitives from labor was peculiarly and exclusively the business of the General Government. They decided not only that the States had no right to interfere with it, but they said they had no right even to make a law to carry it into effect. I know that Judge Taney and Judge Daniels differed as to that; but I dissent on that point; but all the rest of the court, I believe—unless, perhaps, Judge McLean, certainly Judge Story and a majority of the court—decided that all laws made by the States, tending to carry into effect the fugitive slave law, or that provision of the Constitution, when they were distinctly and expressly told it was none of their business; and that all the laws they could pass about it, or in any way inconsistent with the provision of the Constitution, were simply and utterly void.

The legislation which was made on that occasion in my State provided for the security of our citizens by the act of 1844, of which the Senator from Georgia complains, though I do not understand the grounds of his complaint. The act denies to the district court of the United States power to entertain a habeas corpus. I do not know but that may be so; but it is out of my mind, and I think it is not the fact. But when our people said they were lawless and justifying their lawlessness, and that those people should not be taken without process of law, they further provided that nothing in that act should be considered as extending to any person that was acting as a United States judge or marshal, or anybody acting under him. It is true that other legislation has since taken place. When, in 1850, the new fugitive slave law was made, it is true that that was received in that quarter much as the Senator from Ohio says it was in his State. It was obnoxious, abhorrent; it was against the feeling of our people, and especially that part of it which related them to become aids and assistants in following and running after alleged fugitives, under heavy penalties.

It is said that this act was essentially the act of 1793. We did not view it so; we do not now. By this act, certain men called commissioners, who were appointed by the district courts, are clothed with certain powers. Those commissioners had existed before that. They existed by law, appointed by the courts for certain purposes. Those powers were to take depositions to bind over criminals, take bonds—in short, all the preparatory steps looking to a trial in some court. But they were mere ministerial officers, with no power of adjudication, no power of decision. Under the act of 1793, they were related to fugitives from justice, all that is done is to return the man and send a fugitive from justice to some other State, for the purpose of taking his trial there. It looks to a trial. It is a mere preparatory step. But when you come to this law of 1850, to all practical purposes, the commissioners are clothed with the power of adjudication, which is entirely a new feature.

I know judges might send a man out under the act of 1793, if they pleased to act; but that was all safe. So far as the courts, the district judges, the judges of the circuit courts, the judges of the acts of 1850 and 1793 are alike; but, as respects the powers with which the commissioners are clothed, they are utterly unlike. When an application is made to a commissioner, and a man is brought before him, and to be a fugitive from labor, he hears and decides the case. He sends him, if you please, from New England to Texas. I do not know but that a man might claim another as a fugitive from labor who was an apprentice. The very first man, if you please, of the State of Virginia or Georgia, might find some one coming and claiming his son as an apprentice, for service due in California; and the commissioner must send him there. You will observe, the commissioner does not, in this case, send back the man; he does the fugitive from justice, for the purpose of taking his trial in some court. He sends him definitely; it does not look to any court. It is not a ministerial act, preparatory to a trial anywhere. It is not a step preparing him to be tried by any court. It is ultimate, definitive, to all practical purposes. Our people look upon this as different entirely.

Mr. MASON. The Senator will allow me to make an inquiry of him. I understood the Senator to say that there were powers conferred on these commissioners. No. I said which had not been conferred upon the judicial officers mentioned in the act of 1793.

Mr. COLLAMER. I did not say so.

Mr. MASON. Well, I understand the Senator to say that that power is conferred on these commissioners to adjudicate. No. I ask the Senator, power to adjudicate what?

Mr. COLLAMER. Whether the man is a fugitive from labor or not.

Mr. MASON. The Constitution of the United States says that a person held to labor or service in one State shall escape into another, he shall be delivered up upon the demand of the claimant.

Mr. COLLAMER. To whom the service is due.

Mr. MASON. Upon the demand of the claimant to whom the service is alleged to be due, or is due.

The requirement of the Constitution is, that if a person held to service escapes, he shall be delivered up to that person to whom the service is due.

Mr. SEWARD. On claim.

Mr. MASON. He shall be delivered up, not to the person to whom the service is due, because that would be that inquiry; but he shall be delivered up to the claimant. Now, I would submit to the Senator this: what does the Constitution submit to the party who is to adjudicate? Does it submit anything more than the question, whether the alleged fugitive was held to service in the State from which he escaped? Does it submit an inquiry whether he was rightfully held to service, or does it submit the single question, was he held to service, whether rightfully or wrongfully, and did he escape? Having had something to do with the law of 1850, I aver that that law submits to the judicial authority, in the inquiry: was he held to service? without inquiring whether he was rightfully or wrongfully held—was he held to service, and did he escape? If it is found that he was held to service, and did escape, the Constitution requires that he shall be delivered up, and the law says so. That is the whole of it.

Mr. COLLAMER. All that does not relieve the subject at all. The gentleman all the while seems to presume that no man can be taken up under the law, unless he is a runaway slave. That is an entire assumption. A man, and especially a colored man, in New England, who never was out of the State of Vermont, might be claimed as a slave and arrested and brought before a commissioner. Those are the people who are trying to protect, and those are the people who are bound to protect, and those are the people whom our law is meant to protect. The gentleman from Virginia may state it as formally as he pleases; after all, has not the commissioner to decide this: was John De Witt standing before me, or was he if the gentleman pleases, not de jure—I do not make that point, but I am putting it on his own ground—bound to service, under the laws of Virginia, to the honorable Senator from Virginia? Were you, or were you not? That is the question. I do not say that the commissioner is to inquire an inquiry of whether the law that bound him was good or not. That is not the point I am at, but when he is claimed to have run away from Texas as a fugitive slave, and he is brought before the commissioner, the question for the commissioner is, is this man a fugitive slave? and if he decides that he is, he goes to Texas into slavery without any trial, and without a trial. That is not a preparatory step; that is not ministerial; that is not introductory to some other proceeding; it is definitive, practically final.

Our people dislike this feature of the law. It submits to the commissioner the question as to identity of the man claimed, whether he is a man bound to service or not. I do not say he is to decide whether the man was rightfully or wrongfully brought to service; but I mean he is to decide whether he was the man that engaged in the fugitive—and if he is, what then? Are you to take him back, as you would a fugitive from justice, for a trial? Not at all. That is the trial, practically the only trial. Our people look upon that as a different thing. They did indeed provide as the gentleman from Georgia charges, and I desire to turn attention to that. He complains, in the appendix to his speech, that “Vermont pledges the whole power of the State to maintain the claim of the slaveholder.”

No more things. It does provide.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him—I will not unless it is agreeable to him—I wish this thing right as far as the law for the reclamation of fugitive slaves is concerned; and I do not care for any distinction, any difference between the honorable Senator and myself. The honorable Senator says now that I reason upon the law as if it was a law made to reclaim fugitive slaves, but that I do not reason upon it as if it might possibly be construed to one who was not a slave. Now, the Constitution says nothing about slaves, nor does the law.

Mr. COLLAMER. I used the shortest term, Mr. MASON. Very well. The law follows the Constitution. The Constitution says that “No person held to service or labor under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor; but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.”

The law follows the Constitution. Its provisions are these, very briefly: upon the proofs to be adduced by the claimant, if it shall appear to the judicial officer in the State where the fugitive is arrested, that he was a slave, or laborer in the State from which he escaped, and that such service or labor was due to the claimant, he shall be delivered up on the faith of the Constitution—no inquiry whether that service or labor was rightfully or wrongfully due.

Now, the honorable Senator says that it is final; that it is not, as in the case of a fugitive from justice, preliminary only as to the guilt, but it is final. Final, how? Does that honorable Senator mean to intimate that there is a State of this Union where African bondage is recognized—and to one of those States this fugitive slave must be reconveyed—where the most ample, plenary, redemptive provision is not made to give every negro who is claimed a slave, the opportunity, without fee or reward, to have the question tried, there whether he is a slave or not? If that be true, the proceedings of the commissioner may be final or not, as the case may be. If the person is really a slave, who is considered to be his master, it is final. If he is not a slave, let him be taken wherever the sun shines upon a slave State, to make a complaint anywhere, in any village, at any cross-road, or on any highway, to the neighbors, that he is a freeman, and they will tell that honorable Senator, if he does not know it, that there would not be a voice in that whole community that would not insist upon his being remitted to all the privileges and securities which the law gives him—to a trial which is provided for at the public expense—to decide whether he is a slave or not. Those are the facts.

Mr. COLLAMER. I choose to make no issue with gentlemen from the slaveholding States in relation to the generosity, liberality, or anything of that kind, of their country. I am free to acknowledge that I think they are generally quite as frank and liberal people as any, and I think they are a great deal better than their institutions. Their intentions I regret, the goodness of the people I do not. I think the commissioner's decision was final to all practical purposes. I know Dr. Johnson said, when there was talk of starving men, and when it was said a man was free who was in a starving condition, “So is the city coffee-house free to furnish a man with a good dinner, if he has the money.” I said this was not preliminary to any suit, I say so now. I can be easily understood in that. If you desire to understand me. When you enter a regular complaint against a man for a crime, and you send to another State to bring him, it is to bring him into court to answer to that offense charged against him in a proceeding already instituted and pending in a court. When I say the order to return such a man, for such a purpose, is preliminary; but when you come to a fugitive due labor service, it is the action of the commissioner a step preliminary to anything of that kind? I do not say there could not be a suit brought afterwards by the man who is carried away as a slave to Texas—

Mr. MASON. I will not interrupt the Senator hereafter. If I will state that quarrel upon the Constitution, I will not defend the Constitution; but I insist upon the quarrel being fastened upon the Constitution, and not upon the law.

Mr. COLLAMER. Well, I choose to make that a point. I am not like the man who when the sermon did not please him, found fault with the text. I shall not find fault with the text any. [Laughter.] Certain it is, then, that no law, preliminary in any direction, that has no preliminary proceeding, can be made so that that man can bring an action after he is carried away to Texas. I mention Texas simply because it is one of our most distant States. He is carried away to Texas, an entire stranger, and after poverty and destitution. Perhaps he could assert his rights there, but he would be much like the man getting his dinner at the city coffee-house, if he had any money to buy it. The court being open does not assist him any. Besides he is not taken to Texas, all his to there. All his to there in Vermont or Massachusetts where he was born.

The whole of these arguments go on the ground that gentlemen from the South really suppose, they have at all times on their minds, that nobody else is concerned but a fugitive. They are not safe that way, and our people have made some laws with a view to the security of their citizens on that account. They were not satisfied with leaving the question entirely to these commissioners, and the Senator is right in that; but with no judicial powers in them; who are not subject to impeachment or trial. They were not satisfied with that condition of things. They did not like the law; but that was not all.

Another crime came. Some time afterwards it was regularly decided by the Supreme Court that the descendant of an African negro was not entitled to any rights which white men were bound to respect at all. Suppose a man comes after a fugitive slave, as you choose to call him—perhaps one of your race stealers in the southern States may come North, and steal easier there—he gets a description of the man, and gets affidavits in due form, comes into the New England States, or New York State, and makes a complaint, and a man of discretion; takes him to a commissioner, a stranger, and adduces his proof. How can we be safe? How can our people be secure against such; especially, I say, when it was held, as I have said, that the rights of the man are not at issue; this; if you come and get a fugitive slave, all right; if you get a man that never was a fugitive slave at all, it is just as well, because he has no rights that you are bound to respect.

So we saw, from step to step, that there was no security for our colored population whatever, except what the State, in its utmost utter imbecility, might give. Now, I can say, that whatever statutes have been passed, so far as my State is concerned, I believe were intended with no intention to stand and break down this provision of the Constitution. They may run counter to it; they may leak, upon their face, as if they were intended to do it; but our people always expect their laws to be subject to the Constitution. They expect that the courts, in their construction, may say the United States will set aside as void any law they make that contravenes any provision of the Constitution. They expect that, if they do not put in the words, “subject to the Constitution of the United States,” in their laws, they may say further to gentlemen, that if there be any such statutes in Vermont as do contravene that provision, they will be as readily decided to be unconstitutional, I venture to declare, by the supreme court of that State as they would be by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I know, Mr. MASON, that the supreme court is chosen annually by the Legislature, but they make no distinction amongst parties. The present chief justice of that court has been upon that bench for twenty-three years, always a Democrat; a Democrat to begin with, and is now and always has been, and I am afraid always will be, for he recently published a letter in favor of the whole programme. His sentiments are well known. We expect our laws to be decided constitutionally by the Legislature, by our own courts, and especially to abide by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. We have no expectation of making any war on them. If it should happen that any of our laws are really unconstitutional, I hardly think that it lays the foundation of charging men with perjury and invecitive that the English language can furnish, because we may happen to be mistaken.

Sir, I do not think I need pass a law, that a man who resided in the Indian territory in that State, by license of the President, and by consent of the nation, as a missionary for a long time, should not be allowed to remain there without license from the United States, and that finally a penitentiary offense if he did, they took a citizen of Vermont and imprisoned him in the penitentiary. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that that law of theirs was unconstitutional. The gentleman Mr. COLLAMER says that, after all, the man did not get certified, so that the court of Georgia did not disobey it. True it is, that that man, with the other gentleman in the same position, was given very distinctly to understand that he could get out of prison in that way; but he would see that his prosecution he might be pardoned; and as the only hope to get out they did cease, and they were pardoned. Now, sir, I do not think that the court of Georgia should have impugned it, and had desired to improve on the decision of the court.

Mr. WIGFALL. I merely wish to make a suggestion. The Senator has had the floor for three hours.

Mr. COLLAMER. Since half past one o'clock we have quite two hours and a half.

Mr. WIGFALL. Three hours.

Mr. COLLAMER. Two hours and a quarter. Mr. FOSTER and others. Two hours and eight minutes.

Mr. FOST. My colleague commenced at twenty minutes to two.

Mr. WIGFALL. We shall not dispute about time. If the Senator would as soon conclude his speech at another time, I would suggest to him (of course if it be agreeable to be relieved) that he allow us to take up a bill in which I feel at least some interest.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am sorry to disappoint the Senator; but it is so late in the day, that I think it would be effected with that bill if it be taken up.

Mr. WIGFALL. I think we can dispose of it. Mr. COLLAMER. I had better finish what I have to say.

Mr. WIGFALL. I should not have made the suggestion, except that I understood the Senator to encourage it.

Mr. COLLAMER. That was some time ago. It is so late now, that I think I had better go on. Mr. President, I cannot but here say, that to my mind the fact of a State passing constitutional laws, furnishes no foundation for what gentlemen claim, even if the laws of which they complain were really so. I deny that any State in this Union has the foundation for a dissolution of the Union by passing unconstitutional laws. The doctrine of the Senator from Georgia is, that if a State, or several States, pass laws contravening the Constitution of the United States, and which, if you please, are injurious to others; in that case, the Union is broken, and the other States are at liberty to treat it as vacated wherever they please. I deny that doctrine. I deny, in the first place, that the States, as several States, entered into this compact. That, however, is repeated so often that it is almost worn out of the mind of the people. When a State acts, it acts in its organized capacity, by its organs, by its Legislature, or by is Executive. There never was one of the States of this nation that acted in that way in the adoption of the present Constitution. The people of the United States, meeting in the conventions in their several States, adopted the United States Constitution. The States never acted on it as States. It would be a paradox that they should have acted as so. How could the Legislature of North Carolina, for instance, invested as it was, at that time, by the people with the power to levy and collect duties upon imports; how could the State, in its organized capacity, through that organ delegate that power to another body? It could not be done. It never was. It never was attempted to be done. The people of the United States had to meet in their several States in their original condition, as a people in convention, for these reasons: first, it was more convenient; next, if the people of North Carolina had invested their Legislature with the power to levy and collect duties, the people of North Carolina alone would have the power to invest that in another body; to wit, Congress. If you called the whole people of the United States, it would be a different set of people to take that power away from the one who gave it to us, as it is in fact, that this is in that sense a Confederacy. It is a national Government. I say it is a national Government, operating by its own act on individuals, and enforcing its own laws by its own executive power. The old Confederation was a failure. This is a national Government.

If these things be true, can it be possible that any State in this Union can dissolve it, or, if you please, lay a foundation for others to dissolve it, by passing unconstitutional laws? It is utterly destructive of the whole principle of the Government. There is no foundation for it at all. Then I deny that, because laws may have been passed, mistakenly if you please, that were unconstitutional, against the United States Constitution, as a foundation for a dissolution of this Government. But there is another very strange thing in all these assertions; and that is, that upon a certain contingency, the election of a Republican President, the Union is to be dissolved on account of those laws. Pray, what relationship is there between the two? It is utterly absurd. No man telling another, "If you had not caused me to-day for my insolence, I would have paid you that debt a month ago." [Laughter.]

The next point made upon us is, that it will not be good to write to the Republican party to leave the Government, because gentlemen say we are going to break down the Supreme Court. There is another principle of our party mentioned in this connection, and that is, that we are going to exclude them from the Territories. On this last point I have already said all that I wish to say. This is exactly what has been done from the beginning. It is the very thing the Government was made for. Now, in relation to breaking down the Supreme Court, I have but a few words to say.

It is always understood, as a lawyer, that the judges of a court are judges of the law, and of the law and principles—no more. It is binding upon the parties to the suit, and upon all who claim under them, who are privy to it. There it ends. The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is to be treated as that of a court, and there it stops. In the United States, I take it, we never were a party to the Dred Scott decision, nor a privy to it in any legal sense. Then it has no binding force, as a judgment, on the United States. Should it have any force as a precedent or authority? It is a political question as to the power of the Government to forbid slavery in the Territories. That is a question relating to the exercise of the political power of a coordinate branch of the Government. If that is not political, I do not know what is. Well, now, how has that always been viewed?

Some years since, the Supreme Court has deliberately decided that the Bank of the United States was constitutional. The Democratic platform, I believe, even in the last version, following its predecessors, contains an express resolution to repeal an unconstitutional law. Now, how is it understood, by that party at any rate, that a decision of the Supreme Court on a point of that kind is good for nothing at all, unworthy of any respect, and that their own party decisions in their platform are of higher authority, more validly, and more binding than the Supreme Court's decision about that. It is a matter, between them and the court. I take it, however, as authority, and it seems to me that, at any rate, gentlemen who speak upon these platforms ought not to insist much on the decision of the court.

But, Mr. President, the Dred Scott decision, as a precedent—and certainly that is its only effect on us in point of law—I take it, is neither infallible nor inescapable. I hardly think any gentleman will stand away, and say that he doubts the decision of the Supreme Court, as precedent and authority, that we should bow down to it as we would to the inescapable dispensations of Divine Providence; or that we should even say blasphemously of it, "The Lord has given, the Lord has taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." This will not be claimed, I apprehend. Then it is to be examined; and its worth as a precedent depends on the soundness of the arguments that sustain it and the principles on which it stands. If it has any weight, it is that; and, by the way, if the arguments are good to sustain the principle, they would be just as good without the decision of the Supreme Court as with it.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to examine this decision of the Supreme Court a little. They say upon the ground of expediency to show that the power of the Government over the territory before the Mississippi, territory which was not owned at the adoption of the Constitution, does not arise and exist under the territorial clause of the Constitution, and so that the Congress cannot make all lawful regulations. I care very little about that. I think it is totally unfounded in its reasons on that point. But I care very little about it for another reason. The court say that there is, after all, a power in this Government to obtain territory by conquest or treaty. They further say, that there must necessarily be, incident to that power and to the power to admit States, authority, when the Government has acquired a Territory, to frame a Government for it, so as to pass it through a congressional Constitution, and accept it as a State as States. I care very little whether the power came from that clause or not; they say there is that power, any way; and they say that, in framing the laws for that purpose, it is in the discretion of the Congress to make such regulations as they think proper to say what form of government they shall give it. They say further, that the territory being a part of the United States, "the citizens enter it under authority of the Constitution, with their respective rights, interests, and claims." But they say that Congress has power in the discretion of Congress, and that, of course, they are to frame the form of government in such a way as they believe will best advance the interests of the whole people.

They then spend some time discussing whether, in doing that, Congress can exercise any powers except some that are delegated expressly by the Constitution. I look upon all that part of the opinion as mere talk, because they say that the Constitution has not delegated to Congress any power to govern the territory obtained after the war; and, therefore, that that must be incidental to their power to obtain territory. Of course there is nothing in the Constitution by which it is said what the forms of power shall be that they shall exercise there. But they then come to the fourth question, "How do they get it?" In this way, they say, in the first place, that slaves were property, so recognized by the Constitution; in the second place, that everybody has a right to go to the Territories with every kind of property; and, in the third place, that to prohibit their doing so, is to violate the fifth amendment of the Constitution, which says that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.

In making up this syllogism, each proposition in it, whether major or minor, and the ultimate conclusion, are equally important. In the first place, then, are slaves property? The court utterly disregarded their own decisions on that subject in making this. I think if anything can be established from the decisions of courts it is that slavery exists by local law, confined to the territory over which the law is operative; and if persons hold in slavery go out of and beyond that territory, they are no longer slaves; and if slaves are property by the law within that territory, they are not slaves in it in relation to this point, whether slaves are property beyond the States; recognizing them, I deny the major proposition, to begin with. I say the very language of the Constitution implies the contrary. It says that if a person holds to service under the laws of one State escape into another, he shall be returned. "Held to service"—how? Under the laws of a State. "Held to service under the laws thereof," is the language.

When that man bound to be service in one State escapes into another State, is property there? Can the master then take him there, and confine him there, and sell him there, and use him there? If he is like other property, and the Supreme Court says it is precisely the same as other property, all that would be true; but we know it is not. That provision of the Constitution to the States all laws of other States that would release him from the service void; that is all. It contemplates that such laws might be passed, but says they shall not have that effect. It does not disengage him from the service in the State where he belongs, and only provides for the man being surrendered up and taken where he belongs, and where he owes the service. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Prigg v. Pennsylvania, decided the very same thing. They in so many words decided that slavery was a mere local matter; it will cite their very words.

"The state of slavery is deemed to be a mere municipal regulation, founded upon and limited to the range of territorial laws."

What did the Supreme Court do with that decision of theirs when they decided the Dred Scott case? Never said a word about it; utterly disregarded it; never even explained it; never qualified it at all. I hold in my hand the authorities, as collected by Mr. B. B. Bennett, on Colonial and Foreign Laws on the subject of the conflict of laws with regard to slavery. I will not read it at length, but here and there. I hold, first, that at common law, by which I mean the common law of England, slaves could not be held at all. They never were held lawfully in England. When the question arose, it was at once so decided in Sommersett's case. I know there had been an opinion given before that time, when a question arose in relation to their navigation act, whether, under the navigation act, slaves were merchandise. It was not decided by any suit, but an opinion being called for by the jury council, an opinion was given that they were, and therefore, foreigners could not carry on the slave trade with the British colonies; they wanted it all themselves. It was not decided in England, but it carried their negative on the colonial laws. They disagreed to them whenever the colonies attempted to pass laws against the slavery carried there under the Assiento contract, which the gentleman [Mr. BENJAMIN] well understands. It was a profitable business to the trade of England; and, whenever the colonies attempted to get rid of it, they immediately interfered. By the colonial charter, the King in council, had a negative on the acts of the colonial Legislature. Sometimes they were negative in that way; sometimes acts were passed effecting the same thing. In short, they carried the slave trade and the holding of slaves on the colonies by statute. By their power to regulate trade, they forced it upon the colonies when it was always against the common law. Such was clearly the case as laid down by the British courts, carried by Burke. In one case they passed a law, from time to time, statutes to aid and encourage the trade. He says:

"Sir John Hawkins was the first Englishman who, in 1602, introduced the African trade, and carried on his ships in Africa, and transporting and selling them for slaves in the West Indies. In 1609, a Dutch vessel carried a cargo of slaves from Africa to Virginia."

After that was the opinion under the navigation act. He says:

"The Legislature of Pennsylvania, when a British colony, passed, on the 17th of June, 1773, an act to prevent the importation of negroes and Indians into that province. It was disavowed by Great Britain, and was repealed by an act of Queen Anne, on the 20th of February, 1773."

"In 1763, the Governor of Jamaica informed the Assembly of that island, that, consistently with his instructions, he could not give his assent to a bill, which had three times been read, for limiting the importation of slaves into that colony. In 1773, the Jamaica Assembly attempted to prevent the further importation of slaves by an act, which was passed, and for that purpose passed two acts. The merchants of Bristol and Liverpool petitioned against their silence. The board of trade made a report against them. The agents of Jamaica was heard against that report; but upon the recommendation of the privy council the acts were dissolved, and the disavowal was an act of disavowal. The instruction to the Governor, dated the 29th of February, 1773, by which he was prohibited, 'upon some pretext or other, from his government,' from giving his assent to any act by which the duties on the importation of slaves should be augmented."

The same author declares:

"Upon the disappearance of slavery in Europe, it continued in America. The great Powers, England, France, Portugal, Spain, and Portugal, some of whose heart of the freedom of their institutions, exerted all their energies and authority to introduce and maintain it in their colonies, by means of the African trade. The colonies themselves were employed, and their subjects invited and encouraged to fill their colonies with slaves. We turn with disgust from the various expedients by which the colonies endeavored to secure to themselves the monopoly of this odious traffic, to the revenue which was derived from the sale of the slaves, and the merciless perseverance with which England and France uniformly resisted every attempt on the part of their colonies to check its progress."

"To the existence of slavery in their colonies, the parent States gave the fullest and most active encouragement. Under the sanction of their laws, the desecration of their courts, slaves became property. But within they sanctioned, encouraged, and recognized the legality of slavery in their colonies, they disavowed its existence in their possessions in Europe."

This was not peculiar to England, but extended to the other nations mentioned by the author.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator permit me a moment? I ask him just there, whether the author cites any authority showing that the English Government discouraged slavery in England at the time these colonies were in dispute with them—whether he cites a solitary authority or historian?

Mr. COLLAMER. I will read:

"There exists, then, a status which is legal in the country in which it is established, and which is not so in another country in which the same may have been."

"In this conflict there has been a uniformity of opinion among jurists, and of decisions by the highest courts, giving no effect to the status, however legal it may have been in the country in which the person was born, or in which he was previously domiciled. If it is not recognized by the law of his actual domicile."

"This principle was adopted by the emperor's council of Mechlin as the established law. In 1631 it refused to issue a warrant to take up a person who had escaped from Spain, where he had been bought and legally held in slavery."

"Although the Edict of April, 1635, and May, 1635, had recognized the title of slave and of legal property. As the colonies of France, yet within that kingdom it was illegal."

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator perhaps does not understand the precise question I put to him. If I understand him aright, he says that that author declares that, although the English Government established slavery, and forced slavery on its colonies on one continent, it did not recognize slavery at home, and slavery was not recognized at home.

Mr. COLLAMER. I did not say disavowed.

Mr. BENJAMIN. He refused to acknowledge it.

Mr. COLLAMER. Certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask for the authority for that.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is frequently the case in the world, that a man is wronged, and has no redress, right for the time being, until justice and the proper tribunals of justice are appealed to. That proves nothing. It is when the competent authorities are appealed to and a decision is made, that we begin to ascertain what the law is, and what the rights are. As to what the gentleman asks me, now I will read to him further from the same volume:

"In 1729, Sir P. York, then Attorney General, and Mr. Talbot, the Solicitor General of England, gave their opinion, that a slave, by coming from a foreign country, either with or without his master, to Great Britain or Ireland, did not become free; and that his master was entitled to sue for right in him was not thereby determined or varied."

That was not the decision of a court; it was the opinion of the Attorney and Solicitor General:

"This opinion was acted on. Slaves who had arrived in England from the British colonies were bought and sold publicly in the cities of London, Bristol, and Liverpool, and in the year 1771, when the negro Somerset's case was decided, it was said there were at least fourteen thousand slaves in London."

That was without law. They got there, as the author says, by virtue of the opinion expressed by Sir Philip York, who had no judicial power whatever.

The report of King's Bench in that case distinctly and expressly recognized the principle that the status of slavery was a municipal relation, an institution, therefore, confined to a country, and that it was not a relation which existed in a country where such municipal relations did not exist. The negro, making choice of his habitation in England, did not subject himself to the laws of England, and was therefore entitled to the protection of the laws."

A few years afterwards the case of Knight vs. Wedderburn was decided by the House of Lords in Scotland. The master claimed Knight as a slave, but the court adopted the principle that slavery was not recognized by the laws of that kingdom, and was inconsistent with the principles thereof; that the regulations in Jamaica concerning slaves did not extend to that kingdom, and repelled the defender's claim to a perpetual service."

That, it will be observed, was when Scotland was an independent kingdom. In a more recent case, Mr. Burge says:

"It has been applied when the person has placed himself under the power of the country in which the status existed by law, and became subject to the law of another country whose institutions did not recognize that status."

That was where he went on board ship, and the ship carried him off. I also cite the case in the second Barneall & Creswell, decided by Chief Justice Best, where the whole subject is very fully explained, and where the same decision is in the case of Somerset's case. A next case did not merely that case, but was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. I have already alluded to Prigg vs. Pennsylvania. There is also a case, Prigg vs. Massachusetts. There is also a case from the State of Mississippi. Mississippi had forbidden the bringing in of slaves there for sale; but if they were personal property, as the Supreme Court say in this case, the same as other personal property, the States could not regulate the trade in chattels of any kind between them. I take it, if slaves be property at all, they are personal property; for the Constitution says they are persons, and you say they are property. The States have no power to regulate trade between each other. The Supreme Court of the United States were appealed to on that subject, and they said that the power was vested in Congress to regulate trade between the other States and the State of Mississippi, and that no State could regulate the sale of the property of another State within its territory. The Supreme Court, however, sustained the right of Mississippi to do what she did, clearly because slaves were not like other personal property. The States, court said, had the right to prohibit their sale. In a case in Kentucky, Ranckin vs. Lydin, in second Marshall, the words of the court are:

"We view this [slavery] as a right existing by positive law, and not by natural law, without foundation in the law of nature, or in the unwritten common law."

I do not wish to elaborate this point any more. Mr. MALLORY. Will my friend from Vermont permit me to draw his attention to a single Slave Case, the case of Wright vs. Town of Mass. The Somerset case, and it has been referred to in great deal on the other side of the Chamber. I have not a very distinct recollection of it, but I will ask him whether, in that case, which is recognized here, Lord Stowell, the sole question before the court of King's Bench was not as to the right of any man to take another one out of the realm of England without his authority or the authority of law; and whether the principle that a slave, by coming from a foreign country, did not become a slave because he was brought to England was mooted there at all?

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman seems to have put together in his mind the case of the slave Wright, and the case of Wright vs. Town of Mass. The Somerset case, that was before Lord Mansfield. The Somerset case was clear and distinct enough. The fact was, if the slave was the man's property, he had a right to take him. So, when the case of Wright vs. Town of Mass. came on, no distinction of that kind can be made. He had a right to take him away if he was property, but the court decided he had not. It is true that, in the case of the slave Grace, before Lord Stowell, a question arose as to what would be the effect of returning voluntarily into the master's service in the State where the service was legal, and in this case, where the service was not, and had been in England or France. Lord Stowell said that, if the servant Grace returned with her master, voluntarily, to her former status, she would be a slave still in Jamaica. I think that was the decision. That has been the case in the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court, I believe, decided that in the Kentucky case of Graham vs. Strader; and if the Supreme Court, in the Dred Scott case, had simply confined itself to the point that Dred Scott, wherever he was, was a slave, and went back with his master to Missouri, and thereby returned to his former status, no man would ever have made a word about the decision at all.

There is another distinction about it, made by Lord Stowell, and made also, in a case in Pickering, in Massachusetts; and that is, as to whether the State or country into which the man goes, forbids slavery absolutely, or whether it only forbids the master from using power, as a master, over him there. If it is the latter, and voluntarily returns, he waives that; but, if it is the former, and the slavery is declared absolutely void and ended, then the return would not affect it. That is, however, a nice distinction, which it is not necessary to go into here.

The next point in the syllogism is, that slaves, being property like any other property, their owners have a right to go to the Territories with them. What is that founded on? I have no doubt that slaves are not property, though, perhaps, they may be called such where slavery is authorized by law; but even if they were, how does this follow? What is the reason that the slaveholder has a right to take his slave there? You say the Territories are not property, and are not the property of the several States. That is not true. It belongs to the people of the United States. If it belongs to the people of the several States, each several State would have a right to a proportion of it; and if it belongs to the people of the United States, they would have a right to their proportion of the money. Clearly so, if the General Government holds it as a mere trustee for the States, as trustee trusts. Now, how idle is that. Here you have a man who has the right to go there with his property, because each man has his share in the land; and the next day we admit it as free State, and there is not a quarter of the land sold. Now, according to this doctrine, a slaveholder has a right to hold his property, and there it is. It is a most palpable inconsistency. The assumption that the several States have an interest in the land there, is not true. The whole theory of it is founded on a wrong doctrine.

In the next place, it is said that, inasmuch as slaves are property, and recognized as property by the Constitution of the United States, (which argument I have already answered,) if we do not allow the owner to go there with them, it is an infringement of their rights, and a breach of the fifth section of the amendments of the Constitution, which declares that no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law. It is a curious fact, that the extremes of slavery are the extremes of property. One man says he cannot permit slaves to exist in a Territory at all. Why? Because, he says, you cannot deprive any man of his life, liberty, or property, without due process of law. Now, if you permit slaves to exist in a Territory, you deprive a man of his liberty. I say you do not. I do not understand that when they allowed slavery to continue to exist in Louisiana, they deprived any man on earth of his liberty. It was a question of property, and not of liberty. It was to be taken, as they did, into Mississippi from Georgia, did they deprive any man of his liberty? No; he was deprived of it before. So the opposite extreme of the question is not only the Constitution to support their doctrine in a Territory, you prohibit slavery in the Territories, but cite the very same words. They say you cannot prohibit it, because it will deprive the owner of his property. The others say you cannot allow it, because it will deprive the owner of his liberty.

The fact is, neither is well founded. When the Missouri compromise law was made, there was not a white inhabitant, or black inhabitant, in all that vast uninhabited region, north of that line—not a settler in it. When the line was run, and

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST Session.

FRIDAY, MARCH 9, 1860.

NEW SERIES.....No. 67.

it was provided that no slavery should be admitted, I want to know if there was a slaveholder in the United States that parted with any of his slaves? Was there a slaveholder in the United States whose slaves were confiscated? Was there a slaveholder in the United States whose slaves were set free? I do not say that the adoption of the Missouri compromise line confiscated any one's property; or, in other words, deprived a man of his property without due process of law? It does not deprive any man of his property at all, with or without process of law. You have laws in your own States—Virginia has one, said, I think, Maryland; most of the slave States, and many of the free States—against bringing in blacks, and especially slaves, for sale; they forbid it. Does that confiscate any of the property of the slaveholders of Maryland, or any other State? Not at all. Does it deprive any man of his property? Certainly not at all.

I have stated all there is in the Dred Scott decision. The only reason given in the world, the only one suggested, why Congress cannot forbid the taking of slaves into the Territories, is that it would infringe that article of the Constitution, and deprive some man of his property without due process of law. It is a mere assumption, totally unfounded; for, when the act was made, it did not deprive any man of his property, and could not, ever, ever could.

Mr. President, when we consider that this court have utterly disregarded their own decisions, have made assumptions on which they have founded their opinions, which are thus utterly inconsistent; when we examine this decision in the light of its own premises, I say it is not entitled to respect, even as a precedent; and further, in all this there is no intention to break down the Supreme Court. They have disregarded their own decisions in making this. I take it they will disregard them when the case comes another. They have certainly the power to make another.

And now, Mr. President, I will bring my remarks to a termination. The whole question is, in effect: shall we restore the compromise line? Is not that peace? Was not peace while it existed? Is not that peace? Is it not the harbinger of repose? Is it wrong? Is it outrageous? Is it any violence? It is simply to bring back things to where they were; and all I can say now, that if the Republican party is true to its purposes, and can effect them, it will effect that peace, even to the South—for I do not believe they ever asked for that repeal, or ever wanted it. I believe it was altogether the exertion of politicians and a scramble for the Presidency. If anybody, by that repeal and that Kansas-Nebraska bill, will ever get to be President by virtue of it, and succeed, in the purposes for which it was entered upon, I am inclined to think that so far from being secure, it will only add another evil to come out of this box of Pandora.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It cannot be expected, sir, that at the spur of the moment, I should undertake to review, at any length, the very elaborate speech which the Senator from Vermont has delivered this morning; but there are many of the propositions contained in that speech to which I desire to make immediate answer.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If the Senator will allow me, I will move to postpone the consideration of the resolutions before us until two o'clock to-morrow, with a view that they may then be taken up and be heard, with the hope that if they are done, we may dispense with the hour that has been under consideration for some time—an amendment to the West Point Academy bill, which affects the State of Texas, and of the merits of which it is unnecessary for me to say a word. With the consent of the Senator from Louisiana, I will make that motion.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I should observe to the Senator from Arkansas that to-morrow has been set apart for private bills.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then say Saturday, at one o'clock.

Mr. BENJAMIN. On Saturday the Senate will not be willing to be here. I would rather go on with what I have to say now, and then we can take up the bill of the Senator from Texas afterwards.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am certain the Senator from Louisiana will do great justice to the subject on which he speaks, and I sincerely desire to hear him; and when he shall speak I hope to catch every word that falls, such is his character in speaking, and so clear are his views whenever he presents them; but I would be glad if it might be deferred to another day. If not, and he insists, of course I have not one word to say.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have no desire to make a set speech. I merely desire, on the spur of the moment, to make answer to some of the propositions of the honorable Senator from Vermont. "I think I can get through in twenty minutes, possibly thirty, minutes, and then the other bill can be taken up."

Mr. WIGFALL. I trust that the Senator from Louisiana may be permitted to go on, and I am glad to say that I do not refer to that part of the speech in which he treated of the ordinance of 1787, or thecession of the southwestern territory by the original thirteen States. In treating of that compromise, he, in my judgment, gave a false coloring to history; and I propose, so far as I can, in the very few remarks that I am able to make, to correct what I deem to be his errors.

He tells us that slavery and free labor cannot coexist in the same Territory, though they may in the same nation. In the same confederated Union he admits that we may have free and slave States; but he says that slavery cannot coexist with free labor in a Territory; and therefore he says, what more natural or more proper than the arrangement made between the different sections of the Confederacy, for a division of the territory into free and slave States? And he says also, not only was the division natural, but it was made on a natural and obvious basis by a geographical line.

Now, Mr. President, let us look back a little at things as they stood. This Territory of Louisiana, as acquired from France, was exclusively slave territory. The gentleman himself has taken pains to read to us to-day authorities which prove that the colonial system of the French nation was to fix slavery upon its colonies in this country. When Louisiana was acquired, slavery was scattered along the whole valley of the Mississippi. They existed in Louisiana; they existed as high up as St. Louis; and at the French post of St. Louis slaves were then in the service of the whites. The slavery upon which we are depending is not large portions of it into which the white man had not yet penetrated; but, wherever he had penetrated, he had carried with him the right to own slaves; and wherever he had not yet penetrated, the supreme law of the land—of that land by which it was ceded to us—recognized his right to carry his slaves, and be protected in that property.

Now, upon the acquisition thus made, when Missouri applied for admission into the Union, the question was presented to the North, and made by the North upon the ground that the territories were the common property of the nation; and they said to the South just what the Senator from Vermont said to-day: "We are brethren. Let there be no strife between our herdmen. Go ye to the right, and we will go to the left. Let us make an equal division of this Territory." That was the language held to us when the Territory was all slave territory. The South did not say then, "Let the people that inhabit the Territory decide for themselves whether they will have free or slave institutions in the Territory." If they had answered that, the North would have treated the answer as equivalent to an admission on the right to hold it all, because slavery existed over the entire Territory. But the South yielded to northern appeal. They called themselves generous; and the North, when it suits its purpose, calls them so too; and they were equally foolish—weak, foolish, over-confiding. The answer was: "Yes, you are our brethren. If you insist upon a partition of this kind, take the half, and we will be contented with the rest. Draw your line; we have a right to the whole; but we will not burst this bonds that bind us together, on any such claim as this. It is true there is a large portion of this Territory not inhabited; it is all ours; we have a right to it all for the support of slave institutions, because that is the character stamped upon it at the time when we acquired it; but take the half, draw your line, and make the line from the State of the North, and we will retain the south, and be satisfied with it."

It was upon that basis that the South has always said that the action of the North was a northern aggression—that being the assertion that to-day so astute a man as Mr. Webster makes in Vermont. It was an aggression in this: that it claimed from the South that the South should abandon a portion of territory unquestionably slave territory, and yield it to the free institutions claimed by the people of the North.

Well, sir, as it was conceded on all hands that this territory, acquired subsequently to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, belonged to the whole Union; and as the North made this appeal to the liberality and generosity of the South, and it was responded to, what was the next step in our history? The acquisition of territory where slavery did not exist—Utah and New Mexico; and then the very men who, in 1830, had told us that the whole territory was acquired by the people of the United States, that it ought to be equally divided upon a brotherly basis, these same men, in the Congress of the United States, objected to any interest of the South in that territory; insisted upon putting in the bills for the organization of those Territories a provision excluding the South entirely from the region thus acquired. They insisted that the South should have no say in the day, that because the territory had been free before, it should remain so, and that the South should have no part or lot in a region acquired by its own contribution of blood and money. The South insisted then: "We divided with you Louisiana, acquired as slave territory, and as nothing else; you said that it was fair you should have half of that; you said that it was not right nor just that the South should insist upon retaining the whole; and now, when another tract of country, from which slavery has been excluded by the free law, is brought into the Union, you claim the whole. Not so; continue your line of 36° 30', which we drew in 1820 as a compromise; keep on and divide the territory of the Union upon the principle which lies at the base of that compromise, and every slave State we have voted to continue the line, and the northern people, in a mass, objected to it, and refused to continue the principle of the compromise. It is for that reason that the South has said, and insisted over and over again, that it was the North that broke the Missouri compromise; that it was the North that failed in its faith in relation to it, because, independently of the words of the contract to which the gentleman from Vermont has referred, there was a principle that underlaid the whole of the right to take the people of the free jurisdiction in the division of the Territories between the different sections of the Union.

Again, in 1850 you agitated, you made outcry; you attacked the institutions of the South; you took advantage of the fact that the mere agitation of the right to slave property was the focal value of the property; and you kept up such a great alarm throughout the Union that the South again foolishly yielded, and it took the principle that you insisted was the right one then, to wit: that the people of the Territory should determine for themselves, when they came to form a State, whether or not they would have slavery. You were not willing to do that in 1820, because then it would have applied to a slave Territory, where the people were all for slave institutions, and you interfered and made a geographical line. In 1850, when the Territory was inhabited by people opposed to slavery, you refused the geographical line, and fell back on the will of the people; and then when, in 1854, we were carrying out the principle you have adopted in 1850, you said, "No; we will go back to the geographical line, because it now suits us again;" and the honorable Senator from Vermont tells us to-day. Whenever a Territory of question arises, it is to be decided exactly in accordance with the wishes and with your interests, and entirely independent of precedent or of principle.

Sir, the Senator from Vermont asks, if that line was unconstitutional, going back to the western boundary of the Louisiana purchase, if it would become constitutional by being extended to the Pacific ocean? Well, sir, the question is a witty one, and that is all.

Mr. FENDELSEN. Can you answer it?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Certainly; I could not but answer it immediately. It is a question of a witty one, and that is all. The property which was acquired from France, and the other property acquired west since, was not acquired by virtue of any express provision of the Constitution; and therefore it was that the Government could not and still maintain, that there is nothing in the principles of the Constitution of the United States that vested in Congress, as a Congress, the power to pass that compromise line, and to say to the people of the South, "You shall not, north of that line, enter with your slaves acquired by interest in the Territory." But, sir, it was well understood at the time the act was passed, that it was a compromise of our respective rights in the Territory, and that we were willing to abide by the principle contained in the compromise; and consequently, the compromise was made, without due form of law, and without express authority of the Constitution, and therefore not binding under the Constitution, had been carried out in its principle justly and fairly, as far as the people of the South, when all parties were united, bound by the compact thus made between them, would have observed it, not because it was a constitutional enactment, which Congress had the right to make, but because it was a compact binding upon the good faith of all the members of the Confederacy. Under the circumstances, in my sense, that there was no express grant of power in the Constitution to make it. Unconstitutional it was as a law enacted through the authority inherent in Congress, but perfectly binding upon the conscience and good faith of the nation as a compact or compromise. It was not a compromise alone that it ever had validity, was ever treated by anybody as having validity, and consequently, if you had carried out that principle on which the compact was based, if you had gone on in the spirit which the Senator from Vermont invokes to-day, indeed, you, Republican party and the Representatives of the northern sentiment had done nothing but that fair division of the common Territory of the country, which would do equal and exact justice to both sections of the Confederacy, and would conclude, in this sense, and this clause that patriots deplore to-day could never have arisen. Urgent were the appeals made on this floor to carry that compromise line to the western waters, and forever to put an end to the slavery agitation; but no. It was a good line when the Territory was not inhabited by slaveholders; it ceased to be a proper and correct line when applied to a Territory where the people had abandoned the institution of slavery, and had no slaves which might induce them to vote for the establishment of it!

Therefore, it is that the South has been right through the whole of this controversy. Its action has been loyal, frank, liberal, and generous. Yours has been exacting, aggressive, tyrannical, and despotic. You have not cared for your constituents, you have not had a course of conduct to suit your own interests, without regard to principle; and I have no doubt that you justify it to yourselves, all of you, upon the old ground that "the earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof, and that we are the people of the Lord, and therefore entitled to the earth." It is the old ground upon which New England was taken from the Indians. Perhaps it is just as good a title to take our territory from us, as there was originally to take from the Indians theirs.

Mr. FENDELSEN. Mr. President—

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am not through yet.

Mr. FENDELSEN. I thought you were; I beg pardon.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator from Vermont says, further, that the Republican party desires only to restore the Missouri compromise line, which was obliterated by want of faith on the part of the South. He says if we will only agree to the restoration of the decision of 1820, the platform will be quelled, the people of the country will be contented and happy. I want to know upon what ground it is that the Senator from Vermont makes the assertion that that is all the Republican party wants or desires. If I have read aright the platform of that party, it has inscribed upon it this principle: that there never again shall be admitted a slave State into the Union.

Mr. FENDELSEN. You have not read it right; this is all.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think—

Mr. WIGFALL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FITZPATRICK in the chair.) Does the Senator from Louisiana yield the floor?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think I had better stop. I will not quarrel with you on this. I say I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator from Vermont where he gets the authority to make that as the declaration of the principles and platform of the Republican party. I have again and again read that platform, and I understand from it nothing but the restoration of the question on a basis of irreconcilable hostility to slavery, which it places upon the same footing as polygamy, and which, with polygamy, it calls "twice relics of barbarism." I understand that platform to declare that there shall never again be a slave State in the Union. If I am mistaken in that, I must confess that the language is so ambiguous that I have been unable to comprehend it. I have not read it within a day or two; but that is the impression remaining firmly fixed on my mind.

Mr. WIGFALL. It is to exclude slavery from all the Territories.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Well, then, how can there be a slave State? Of course that is the merest quibble on earth, if that is what is meant. It is that there shall never again be any Territory in which slavery is introduced, except of course the Territories or Territories are incorporated into the Union, they shall be incorporated as free States only. There can be no other deductions drawn from a proposition stated in those terms.

But, sir, I go further; and I want to know who are the proper exponents of the northern party on this subject; whether it be the honorable Senator from Vermont, who only wants peace between brethren, that one shall go to the one side of the line and the other to the other, or the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. FOSTER], who has just read the platform and understands it a look of great merit. The honorable Senator from Vermont, who is no honor to the party to which he belongs, still, I believe, is not considered as its foremost leader. That post is assigned by the reputation of the honorable Senator from New York, who says just the reverse of what he does. And if we look to the action of this party in its State convention, if we look to the authoritative declaration of its leaders, we cannot mistake the purpose to be to return to what the Senator from Vermont himself has said is due to have been the policy of the fathers; that is, to hunt in and smother out slavery; and the Senator from Vermont wants the experiment tried. He thinks it is not tried yet. He says that the fathers supposed that if they did not get more expansion to the west, they would do out, and have to try that. He thinks that seventy years of experience; he thinks that a multiplication and increase in the number of slaves, by which they are now over four million, instead of four hundred thousand; he thinks that a majority multiplying, and the parallelism of any other nation in the face of the earth, and that, too, continued in almost geometrical ratio for three fourths of a century, is not yet enough of a trial; it is still an experiment; and he wants to go on experimenting, to see if slavery will die out of itself in the southern States; and yet, in a very few moments after, he said the two systems of States would exist together for some time, and, for aught he knew, for centuries to come. There was an inconsistency in the remarks of the honorable Senator from Vermont, which I pay no particular attention to, because it is impossible to discuss this question, on his side, without unfairness and inconsistency, from the very nature of the subject, it is not possible that it should be otherwise.

Now, sir, a few words about these personal-liberty laws. Mr. President, I had supposed that, if there was a Senator in this Chamber, differing from me in political sentiment, who would give a fair and candid interpretation to the laws passed by the northern States on this subject, it was the honorable Senator from Vermont who has just closed his speech. I thought that Senator would have risen in his seat and said, "It is true we have passed these laws; it is true that their every word and every line breathes their intent in unmistakable terms; it is true that their spirit is patent to deprive you of your rights to your fugitive slaves; this is all wrong; it has been done in a spirit of pure fanaticism, at a time of extreme excitement; we will undertake to reform all that; we admit the wrong; the proper mode of remedying it is not, as you are doing, threatening to leave the Union, but appealing to our sense of justice and brotherly kindness; we will undertake to protect the liberty of every citizen to do so." Not so, sir; not so. That honorable Senator, following the lead of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER], and the lead of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DECATIE], and of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE], who spoke yesterday, and every other Senator, who sits on the Chamber that I have heard speak on that subject, undertakes to defend those laws by affecting—that is courteous to say so, I will change the word—by asserting that they are passed to prevent their free citizens from being kidnapped to protect the liberty of their free citizens. Well, now, Mr. President, there might be something in that assertion if honorable Senators had brought forward a solitary case in which that legislation had ever been necessary at the North; if they had shown the impress of a single freeman of the North have been kidnapped and carried South, and retained there in slavery.

Mr. FENDELSEN. There was one case, where a citizen of Pennsylvania was taken to one of the slaveholding States, and released when he got there; the impression of a single freeman.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Exactly. My question was, point me to a case where a freeman was taken as a fugitive slave, and carried to a slave State and retained there as a slave?

Mr. FENDELSEN. That makes no difference. He was kidnapped originally.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I did not say that a man cannot be kidnapped, any more than that a man cannot be murdered.

Mr. FENDELSEN. That is what we want to prevent.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I say your laws were never passed for any such thing, and the civilized world will bear me out in the assertion. They were never passed for any such purpose; and on their face, and in every line and word of them, they were the impress of a single freeman, in which they were passed. It was to prevent the South from reclaiming its fugitive slaves. Again and again does that appear on the face of the laws. The honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER], with whom I passed a few words the other day on this same subject, asserted that I had not given the proper construction to the Connecticut law. Somebody in Connecticut has sent me, within a day or two, a newspaper, in which the editor expressed his astonishment at the denial of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, who, acting on this same subject, asserted that the Speaker of the House of Representatives of that State at the time the law was passed; the editor stating that it was known to every man in Connecticut what the object of the law was, and he was astonished to hear it denied.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the honorable Senator allow me?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. The statement which the honorable Senator makes on the authority of a newspaper I can assure him is not true. There is not a word of truth in it. I was a member of the Legislature in the earlier stages of the session, but had resigned my seat, and ceased to be a member, long before the law was introduced or suggested, and had nothing to do with it more than the honorable Senator himself.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I stated to the honorable Senator the source of my information. I will furnish him the paper.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt the honorable Senator states the information as he got it. My object was simply to contradict it, and to assure the Senator that he has been deceived.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I understand that the honorable Senator from Vermont, at the same time that he says that the people of the North would be willing to restore fugitive slaves, and to carry into effect any fair law, objects to this particular law on account of its provisions; and, in spite of the perfectly lucid and satisfactory explanation of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON], in spite of the reference to the language of the Constitution, the Senator from Vermont persisted in representing the fugitive slave law as giving finality; precisely, to the decision of the commissioner, and he says that these personal liberty bills were passed at the North in consequence of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Prigg vs. Pennsylvania, which first startled the North, by the assertion of a right in the claimant to take possession of his slave where ever he might find him. That is very strange because, although the Supreme Court of the United States may have so decided, and I do not recollect that it did, in the precise words before the case of Prigg vs. Pennsylvania, it had been decided in several northern States, and for the further reason that, if I understand the act of 1850, it does no more so far as that is concerned, than to give the provisions of the Constitution. The act of 1850, does indeed provide that the owner may arrest his slave without process of law; that the party making claim to the fugitive from service or labor may seize him if he can; but it provides that he shall take him before the magistrate. Here the liberty is taken away from the owner, and him out of the State under the law, but if he finds the individual, bound or held to service to him, he has the right to put his hand on him, to make manumission of him, and to carry him before the magistrate, in order to have the law with authority to inquire into the fact of the escape, and of the identity of the individual, nothing more. The law is that—

"The person or persons in whom such service or labor may be due, or his, her, or their agent or attorney, duly authorized by power of attorney, in writing, acknowledged and certified under the seal of some legal officer or court of the State or Territory in which the slave may be found, may pursue and reclaim such fugitive person, either by procuring a warrant from some one of the courts, judges, or county-clerks aforesaid, of the proper county, district, or court, for the apprehension of such fugitive from service or labor, or by seizing and arresting such fugitive, where he may be found, and detaining him until satisfied with receiving such person to be taken, forthwith before such court, judge, or commissioner, whose duty it shall be to hear and determine the case of such claimant in a summary manner."

What is he to "determine?"

"Upon satisfactory proof being made, by deposition or affidavit, in writing, to be taken and certified by such court, judge, or commissioner, or by other satisfactory testimony, duly taken and certified by some court, magistrate, justice of the peace, or other legal officer authorized by the laws of said State and take depositions under the laws of the State or Territory from which such person owing service or labor has escaped, and upon the oath of the person or persons of other authority, as aforesaid, with the seal of the proper court or officers thereof attached, which seal shall be sufficient to establish the competency of the person or persons with proof, also, by affidavit, of the identity of the person whose service or labor is claimed to be due as aforesaid," &c.

The Senator from Vermont asks that that is precisely a final decision, and that no man can reach his point? He says that when a person is pursued as a fugitive from justice, as a criminal, it is by virtue of some process proceeding, and that the committing magistrate must send him before the court to be tried. Well, sir, a victorious officer was made by the State of Virginia; if any negro man in the South claims his freedom, it is enough; and the laws provide him the simplest remedy, and the whites all around him will aid him. The law provides that he shall be taken by force, taken from the custody of the man who holds him, and be placed beyond the reach of any cruel process of restraint. He is protected in the assertion of his freedom. The fact that he has run away without claiming freedom, the fact that he has escaped from the service from which he fled, without making claim to freedom, is the strongest of all presumptions, almost proof positive that he admits his being legally held to service. It was also, but notwithstanding that, if there should have been anything to prevent him making that claim, he is sent back under the authority of law, under the order of the magistrate, with all proper guards, to the place from which he fled. He is put just where he was before he fled—in no worse, in no better position; and the Constitution of the United States intended that, and that alone, that the fact of the escape should not change his condition; that the fact of his escape should leave him just where he would have been without the escape, in order that there should be no conflict between the legislation of the one State and the other—that from which he escaped and that to which he fled.

The Senator from Vermont says that the South always speaks in this matter as if anybody was ever going to be chained under the fugitive slave law but a fugitive slave. Why, sir, would there be the slightest trouble on the face of the earth, in his free inhabitant of Vermont, for whom he is so tenderly tenacious—would there be the slightest difficulty on the face of the earth for the free inhabitant of Vermont, if seized as a slave from the South, to prove before the commissioner his residence in Vermont as a freeman, and that he was not a fugitive from labor; and if a case of mistake does occur—as cases sometimes will—if it is found that the case is not a case of a fugitive from labor, but one mistake has occurred in three quarters of a century, notwithstanding the constant use of the provisions of the law? Can you find me any other classes of cases in which but one mistake has been made in three quarters of a century? Would you not say that, then I will be sure that your southern legislation is directed to the safety of your own people, and not to the intent to evade your duties to us by holding our fugitive slaves, in spite of our reclamation.

Now, sir, what I have already said comprehends very nearly all that I intended to say on this subject, until towards the close of the speech of the honorable Senator from Vermont. He gave utterance to some of what appeared to me to be the most monstrous constitutional heresies I ever heard of. The honorable Senator from Vermont absolutely denied that this Government was a confederacy of States; declared that it was a Government formed by the people as a people; said that it could not be otherwise; said that it was ratified by the people of the United States, and that they were bound to obey it, in defiance of the Constitution itself, in defiance of the language of the amendments, in defiance of the terms of acceptance of the Constitution by the State of New York, the State which acted for the State of Vermont, and that therefore it is a Constitution of the adoption of the Federal Constitution. Vermont, I believe, was not a State at that time, or, at least, was not admitted to be a State. It is well known that, in New York, there was very great difficulty in inducing the people to adopt this Constitution. Nobody will doubt that, without the adoption of it by the State, it would not have bound the State.

But the honorable Senator from Vermont draws the conclusion that, because it was adopted by the people of the States, and not by the Legislatures of the States, therefore it is a Constitution ratified by the people of the United States. The answer to that is so plain and obvious that I am astonished that the suggestion should have been made. The Constitution of the United States was not adopted by the Legislatures of the States, but by the people of the States had given them no power to part with any State sovereignty. The people of the States were themselves the ultimate depositaries of the sovereignties of the States. They had authorized their Legislatures to make laws for the States, and to authorize their Legislatures to part with any portion of the State sovereignty; and consequently, when the question arose in relation to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, the State Legislatures, finding themselves without any authority delegated by the people to part with any portion of the sovereignty of the States, called conventions, and it was in those conventions that the people of the different States, as sovereigns, undertook to discuss whether they were willing to give any portion of the State sovereignty in the formation of the Federal Constitution; and the people of the State of New York had great difficulty on the subject. They were nearly equally divided, even when the Convention was originally convened in the year 1787.

"We, the delegates of the people of the State of New York, duly elected and met in convention, having maturely considered the Constitution of the United States of America, agreed to on the 17th day of September, in the year 1787, do declare and make known—that all powers originally and essentially sovereignly derived from the people, and that government is instituted by them for their common interest, protection, and security."

"That the powers of government may be reassumed by the people."

What becomes of the argument of the honorable gentleman against the fugitive slave law? "That the powers of government may be reassumed by the people whenever it shall become necessary to their happiness; that every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by the clearest and most undeniable evidence transferred to the Congress of the United States, or the Departments of the Government thereof, remains."

Not to the people of the United States, but— "to the people of each State, or to their respective State governments, to whom they may have granted the same; and that those clauses in said Constitution, which declare that Congress shall not exercise certain powers, do not imply that Congress is entitled to any powers not given by the said Constitution, but such clauses are to be construed and interpreted to certain specified powers, or as inserted merely for greater caution."

Now, sir, what becomes of the pretense that the States of this Union were not parties to the Federal Constitution? Consider the Government as formed by the people in mass? Mr. President, it will be observed that this branch of the argument treats of the resolutions offered by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS], which were also spoken of by the Senator; and that no State will constitute pretty much all that I have to say on those resolutions. Those resolutions announce principles so plain and clear, so fully in congruity with the original intent of the Constitution, with what I have always considered the understanding of the States who joined in the General Government, that I cannot conceive how argument can be made against them.

One more word, sir, and I shall finish. The Senator from Vermont repeats what I deem the legal heresy of saying that slaves are not property. I had, some twelve or eighteen months ago, a debate with the honorable Senator from Vermont on that subject; and I do not mean to repeat what was then said any further than I can avoid; but, upon that occasion, I assumed to show that, from the time negroes were first known in Europe and America, they were considered as property. Mannfield made his decision in the Sommersett case, they never had existed except as slaves, as I showed that they were treated as slaves, as a matter of course, by all the continental nations of Europe, nearly all those of Asia, and even in such upon the colonies; I showed that there was no law declaring them to be slaves; but they were treated as such by the open and common consent of mankind; not merely by the tacit consent of the people of England, thus giving origin to the common law, but by the consent of mankind. I showed that negroes existed in England, and were bought and sold in the market.

If Senators will look at a number of the Tattler, for the year 1702 I think it is, they will find a complaint of the negro Pompey, addressed to Sirs, who are the owners of the negro Pompey. Pompey complains that his silver collar is not as pretty a one as his mistress gives her dog. The negro slaves were not only held and sold in the English markets, but they had collars around their necks, and were treated as animals, and as dogs. They were not only treated as such, but they were treated as such in every capacity that that of mental servants, subject to the will of their masters. According to the admission in the Sommersett case itself, him and to the Senate, that the personal of these documents has not by any means satisfied me that this regiment ought to be put in service. I will endeavor not to repeat what I said before, but to allude a little to the points which I took.

The first objection which I made to proceeding with such intemperate rapidity in relation to this matter was, that we had no recommendation from the Executive on the subject. Well, sir, to this day, we have not a message from the President recommending the communication of Governor Houston, we have no recommendation from him. In the next place, I said we had nothing from the Secretary of War to show that there had been any such thing as a recommendation of the President, or, where, which called for putting this regiment into service. The honorable Senator supposes that the Secretary of War has really recommended this for the purpose, or from the necessity of having troops in Texas. It is not so. All he does in making his communication to the Committee on Military Affairs, is simply to state that he communicates the documents called for with his own views, or an abstract of what he understands to be their subject-matter, and that the opinion of the Department as heretofore expressed on acceding to the request of the President, in relation to the amount of troops of the Army remains unchanged; but he does not say a word or intimate that he needs any troops for Texas, or for the purpose of protecting that border against the Indians or against Cortinas and his band; and as the result of it is that on the strength and faith of this difficulty in Texas, we have renewed proposition, which we have uniformly voted against and refused to sanction, to increase the Army. That is all we have from the Secretary of War; and now the question is whether it is necessary. The Secretary of War does not say that he has no troops enough to effect all the emergencies of the case in Texas itself. He only says that he requires more troops, as heretofore stated to Congress several times, for the general—he does not use the word general—but for “the exigencies of the service.”

Now, sir, it will be remarked in regard to these papers that they communicate no sort of information, official or otherwise, of any interest, arising from Indian troubles on that border. They communicate no statement from the Department of the President in reference to the difficulties upon that frontier of such an amount that the present Army of the United States is not perfectly adequate to take care of them. Well, what have we? If Senators have read these documents they will perceive what we have said, and will call the attention of Senators, for a few moments, simply to what there is in them.

Who is the man that is making this difficulty on the border? A Mexican-Texas, it seems. How did the difficulty arise? These papers say from a private quarrel, and a private quarrel growing out of difficulties among the Mexicans and the Americans on our side and the other. They state, moreover, (and it is stated in an affidavit from the clerk of the court in that region) that Cortinas is a man who has been indicted for murder in Brownsville, and although under indictment for murder, he was suffered to go at large, going into that town and going out as he pleased, under the eye of the sheriff, and not arrested, the clerk says, and another witness says, because we were so weak in our arms and carried votes, and the officers wanted his influence and did not like to interfere with him. Subsequently he got into a quarrel, and committed outrages in Brownsville. He collected a body of men, Mexicans and Americans, such as he could get, and about the same went over to the other side, and came back again.

What has been the result of all this? It went on increasing until finally his forces were so large that it brought about a collision between him and certain troops of ours. He was beaten by Major Houston, with two companies of rangers, he fled across the border, and established himself some miles distant, in a position from which, in parties of two and three, his band makes incursions. Major Hinzelman was applied to by others, to know what troops he wanted in order to protect that frontier, and he said all he wanted, after he had whipped this fellow with five hundred men under him, was two companies of Texas rangers. Those two companies were furnished to him, and he has them there. Nobody pretended there was any necessity for any more troops, until the letter came from General Houston, now Governor of Texas, himself.

Mr. WIGFALL. The Senator from Maine will excuse me for interrupting him. I do not wish to take up time, for I do not want to speak, but I made a motion here to call on the President before Governor Houston sent his message, and I introduced it two or three days before he got his official communication.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not official information for us.

Mr. WIGFALL. You said nobody had called attention to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I said officially; nobody who has a right to act in the business had called on the Government. Mr. Floyd himself says that the accounts have been so contradictory all along, that nobody could tell what the truth was in relation to the matter. It went along thus: Major Hinzelman having under his command all the troops that he called for, and all that he said were necessary to protect the border, until the communication was made from the Governor of Texas, stating the difficulties and calling for aid from this Government; and what has this Government done? Mr. Floyd says that, since he sent the first call upon him, he at once dispatched all the disposable force of the Army to Texas, in order to protect the Texas people; and he does not say that there were not enough of them, that he wants more; but that he has done is not sufficient for my exigency, and it is not enough to accomplish the purpose, and he does not ask us to furnish him with any more troops for that purpose.

Then, sir, we have a little curious piece of intelligence in reference to this matter which makes me somewhat suspicious. I must confess. A year ago General Twiggs withdrew the troops from two or three places in that neighborhood; and he gave as a reason for it that it was not necessary they should be continued; and that there was a great outcry there at his withdrawing them; but the truth is, that this being the first call upon them for the mere purpose of the money that is there. They like to have troops there for that purpose; and they make an outcry whenever any are removed, because they get the benefit of it so long as they remain; but it is not necessary. It was until October last, when this difficulty with Cortinas arose, according to these papers, before there was any occasion whatever to change the disposition which General Twiggs had made; there were no difficulties from the Indians, or anything of the kind. Then it went on, and I have stated, from a beginning with a private quarrel among men, and getting up to a particular point, where those men are beaten and driven over the border by a small company of United States troops, aided by a couple of companies of rangers, which are there now; and since then, on the call of Governor Houston, all the disposable force that was necessary has been sent on its way there to meet these difficulties. In the face of that, we are called upon—not by the President, not by the Secretary of War, and the other gentlemen we lately took for advice in this matter, but by a man who has a right to make the call—to make an appropriation to organize this regiment of volunteers, and to put it into the field, in addition to what has been done.

The outrages have been committed; this man is driven across the border; there is a large body of troops there; and, in the ordinary course of human experience among military men—the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs can tell me, probably—how long will it take to organize a regiment after the first call? It has been laid waste, after the difficulty has occurred? Cattle have been driven off, the borders have been stripped, say the Senators. The troops have all been concentrated there that can be spared, and enough for the purpose, if we may judge by what the Secretary of War tells us, and yet, with all these facts, we are called upon to pass this appropriation, looking forward to a period of two or three months before these other troops can possibly be put into the field. I am constrained to regard this as a strange and the disposition we have made to raise a regiment of mounted volunteers in Texas, giving employment to men who desire employment; expending a still larger amount of money, all of which is to be added upon the Treasury of the United States; resulting in the increase, for a time, at least, of the disposable force of the Army, for which I can see no possible necessity.

All the facts that I have stated, I derive from the documents, and there are many more that bear on the subject; but I am not disposed to detain the Senate at this late hour of the evening. I only wished to call the attention of the Senate to the facts exhibited before us before they vote away, upon such grounds, in the purchase of the Texas Treasury, millions of dollars, to be expended year by year for I know not what length of time.

Mr. WIGFALL. I promise not to take up time, but to call the Senate to take a vote, and I will say in a word or two, and that in defense of the people whom I represent here in part. The Senator from Maine has been fit to allude to a part of General Twiggs's letter, dated San Antonio, March 28, 1859. I shall read it, and my comment will be as brief as the charge:

“Having an extensive frontier to guard from an enemy who was making daily incursions upon the inhabitants, and having a few troops, I, after mature consideration, determined to abandon his posts on the Rio Grande, and place the troops on the frontier.”

Then General Twiggs, for he is good for slandering the people of Texas, is authority, at least, for the number of troops that are there necessary. I say, and I regret that the Senator from Mississippi is here present, where he is, and I regret the time that he had the administration of the War Department there were as many troops on the Rio Grande as there now are in the entire department of Texas, and in the department of Texas is included all the troops north of it, and west of it that reach to the head waters of the Canadian, the Red river, and the Witham. After he passed from the War Department these troops were withdrawn by General Twiggs. I speak not of what I have heard from him, but I know what is the sentiment of the Army. I know what is the sentiment of the Army. There was, in ancient times, a building erected; and there was one who felt that he could not do likewise, but he could destroy that which had been done; and the temple of the Ephesian Diana was burned to the ground. I do not choose to mix the private quarrels between military men, and the quarrels between the Senator from Mississippi and the Lieutenant General of the Army and General Twiggs; I have nothing to do with them; but he established the quarrel, and he very clearly broke them up, and what was the result? General Twiggs shall answer for himself, and I will put him upon the stand, as he has chosen to slander the people whom I here in part represent. He says, after he has removed these troops:

“There is not, nor ever has been, any danger of Mexicans crossing on our side of the river to plunder or disturb the inhabitants; and the outcry on that river for troops, is solely to have an expenditure of the public money.”

There is the charge. Now, sir, this philosopher, with boots and spurs and cocked hat and feathers, comes to the conclusion that there has been no invasion, and there will be none; therefore he removes these troops, and breaks up the posts upon the border, and will not choose to resume the time of the Senate in reading it; but, in his letter to the Secretary of War, in 1858, some months previous to this time, he says that his reason for removing these troops in, that there is no Government in Mexico, and therefore there is no security from the Government of Mexico to judgment.” No Government in Mexico; and therefore, says General Twiggs, there is no necessity for troops on the borders.

Well, sir, in his wisdom, he came to the conclusion that the people of Texas merely wanted the money of the Government. A second time there was no danger of invasion, and therefore he would remove the troops; and what was the result? We are involved in a war. If his judgment as to that matter fails, possibly the Senator from Maine may admit that his judgment of the motives of those people is precisely the same—a failure and an error. They knew upon the lower Rio Grande that they were in danger of invasion; that these difficulties were pressing upon them, and what would follow if these posts were broken up? Hence they were hurried to choose to draw the troops. As long as General Twiggs could put his prejudice, his passion, in his pocket, he spoke truly; he had not troops enough there; therefore he withdrew them; but he could not help making a fling at those who had gone before

Mr. DAVIS. In the document you hold in your hand.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish some one to explain it. It may be somewhere there. I have read only half through. I do not object to giving a regiment to Texas. My principal objection is that it is hurried through before we can find out what it is about. I should like to be left until we go home to-night and read the documents, and find out whether there is any reasonable cause for it. It seems that this bill is brought up as if it were sure to be effective to-morrow, if it were passed. Every time it is brought up it is the result of a long debate, when every voice is exhausted. This document, I believe, was only ordered to be printed yesterday, and I saw it for the first time this morning when I came here and began to read it. I am inclined to vote, in some form or other, for a proper measure, and I think the suggestions of the Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the committee, are very sound ones. I do not, however, see any purpose of Governor Houston to take this matter in his own hands. I see, as far as I have read, that two consuls of Texas were ordered to meet him in the field, and were put under Major Heintzelman, a United States officer, and fought this battle with him and drove them off; and I think I read in a note from him to somebody else that these two would be enough. Perhaps I did not understand it, though.

Mr. DAVIS. I think he morely means enough for the defense of Brownsville. Our frontier is a very long one.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not mean to vote any money, if I can help it, without knowing what it is for, and I do not mean to object to voting money when I am satisfied it is for a good purpose; but I do not think it is quite right to force people to read documents when gentlemen are addressing the Senate who they want to hear. That is the objection.

Mr. WIGFALL. You will not get any tariff, if you reject this.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not vote money out of the Treasury here in order to get a tariff. I think we had better look to it, and see that we have no right to hire any more money, and not willing to vote the money, if I can read the documents, and be satisfied in my own mind that it is wanted; but, if you are determined to push it through, after six o'clock, when we are all exhausted and cannot read the papers, it is in your kind of legislation. If there has been any purpose to delay this measure by any factious disposition, I have not seen it.

Mr. GWIN. Does not the Senator know that the reason the bill has not passed is because we have extended courtesy to gentlemen who had prepared speeches on a question which was not pressing at all, and have now given away two days on an appropriation bill in order to extend that courtesy to those gentlemen?

Mr. SIMMONS. I suppose that this appropriation bill had passed as it came from the House, there would be no objection to it.

Mr. GWIN. But a pressing necessity requires the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why was it not estimated from the Department and sent here?

Mr. GWIN. It has been estimated here.

Mr. SIMMONS. It came in yesterday, as I understand. Before that, this had been urged on the Senate without any estimates at all. They came in last night, and they have been printed, and we have not yet read them. If there was any necessity to print them, it was that Senators might have an opportunity to read them and understand them. The Senator says this bill has been pending three or four days; but I never heard of any estimates until last night.

Mr. GWIN. Does not the Senator report that the Senator from Mississippi reported a bill on estimates from the Committee on Military Affairs, and stated the facts to the Senate? It has never heretofore been required to have printed estimates when a committee of the House has reported a bill on estimates to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say as I said before, as we have these printed we should have an opportunity to read them. He reported the bill yesterday, and it was thought by the Senate better to print these communications, than to waste judgment whether the money was necessary. I agree great deference should be paid to committees, and I generally do so; but as this is a little extraordinary, I must confess I do not exactly see through it.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island, that when I voted yesterday against the printing, it was because it was already on the table printed in the Daily Globe. Our very skillful and rapid reporters had taken it down as read at the desk, and it was in the Globe.

Mr. SIMMONS. I had not seen it at all, and did not know it was there. I should like it to go on.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Some remarks have been made here in regard to the evacuation of the forts on the Rio Grande. In justice to the delegation who have been here, as well as to myself, I feel bound to say that I understood that the delegation that was here at the time of General Henderson, protested against the removal of these posts. Last year a very strong memorial was sent by the citizens of Brownsville, addressed to the Secretary of War, and presented by myself and Colonel Ward, then Senator, in March last, to the Secretary of War, and urged with all the real arguments we could use. I did not hear then any good reason, and never heard any since for the evacuation of the posts. The object was to concentrate troops on the northern frontier. It was a very good object, but the troops ought not to have been taken from the lower Rio Grande for that purpose.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, yeas 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Blinnham, Bostelle, Foster, Hale, Bartlett, King, Sumner, and Ten Eyck—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Bigler, Briggs, Brown, Cheate, Clingman, Davis, Douglas, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammon, Hendon, Hunter, Johnson, of Arkansas, Kennedy, Lane, Latham, Mason, Powell, Sebastian, Stoddard, and Wallcut—23.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 8, 1860.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FINES, ETC., OF MAIL CONTRACTORS.

THE SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Post Office Department, communicating orders of the Postmaster General for fines, deductions, &c., from the pay of mail contractors, from July 3, 1850, to June 30, 1859; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING DEFICIENCIES.

THE SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Superintendent of Public Printing, submitting estimates for deficiencies for printing, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES S. CAMPBELL.

Mr. DUELL. I was absent the other day when the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was called for reports; and I desire now to report a bill from that committee, for the purpose of having it referred to a Committee of the Whole.

There is no objection.

Mr. DUELL then, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of James S. Campbell; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BURCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the payment of expenses incurred in the suppression of Indian hostilities in the State of California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CALIFORNIA MAILS.

Mr. BURCH also, by unanimous consent, presented concurrent resolutions of the California Legislature, praying for a Sunday mail between San Francisco and Sacramento City, on certain occasions.

Also, concurrent resolutions of the California Legislature, asking appropriations for certain mail routes in the northern portion of the State.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE AT MALTA.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill allowing a fixed annual salary to the United States consulate at Malta.

ELECTION OF TERRITORIAL OFFICERS, ETC.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill for the purpose of reference merely.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows: A bill granting lands to actual settlers in the Territories, and for the election of all territorial officers by the people, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURNETT. I object.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Illinois. I merely want to have the bill referred to the Committee on Territories. Other than the true character have been referred to that committee.

Mr. BURNETT. Well, sir, I withdraw the objection.

The bill was then read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

ORGANIZATION OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BRANCH. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report whether any legislation is necessary, and can be adopted consistently with the Constitution, to facilitate the organization of the House of Representatives, and to preserve its order and regulate its proceedings previously to the election of its Speaker.

[Cries of "That is right!" from the Republican benches.]

Mr. McKNIGHT. I understand that the Committee on Rules has that subject under consideration.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Oh, the resolution is right.

Mr. McKNIGHT. I do not object to it.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill for reference merely.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

RAILROAD LANDS FOR NEBRASKA.

THE SPEAKER. Objection being made, nothing can be done which is out of order. The regular order of business is the consideration of a bill reported yesterday from the Committee on Public Lands, granting alternate sections of public lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the Territory of Nebraska; the pending question being upon the motion to commit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I made the motion yesterday that that bill should be printed. It is a very important bill, and has just been printed.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to know to what time of day the gentleman desires to postpone it. I shall object to its coming up in the morning hour.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. The committee will all be through by that time, and it will not interfere with anything.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has a right to make the motion to postpone.

Mr. HOUSTON. I shall object to the bill coming up after the morning hour. It is morning-hour business.

Mr. GROW. What is the postponement proposed? What is the motion of the gentleman from Indiana?

THE SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Indiana is, to postpone the further consideration of the bill for one week from to-day, without naming the hour.

Mr. GROW. I am opposed to the postponement, unless the bill is to come up after the morning hour.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will make no objection to my motion.

Mr. GROW. I cannot permit the committee to take up more time than the rules allow it to take up; for, by these postponements, one committee may absorb the whole time.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I would take the same time to-day as it will when it comes up.

Mr. GROW. Well, I cannot agree to the postponement, so far as I am concerned. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Indiana by adding to it "after the morning hour." Let us have a vote on that amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. That motion cannot be in order without a suspension of the rules, and I object to it.

THE SPEAKER. The motion is not in order. Tellers were ordered on the motion of Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, for James Graw and Val Laxton were appointed.

THE HOUSE divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 51.

So the bill was postponed for one week.

COMMITTEE DISCHARGED.

On motion of Mr. HOARD, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Rudolph J. Shumaker, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Land Claims.

LIABILITIES OF SHIP-OWNERS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I desire to introduce a bill merely for the purpose of reference. I hope there will be no objection.

There being no objection,
Mr. JOHN COCHRANE introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to limit the liability of ship-owners, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1851; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GROW. Was that bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands?

THE SPEAKER. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from New York, by unanimous consent, and referred.

Mr. GROW. Well, sir, I call for the regular order of business.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. GURLEY. I rise to a question of privilege. In answer to a resolution adopted by the House, and sent to the Committee on Public Printing, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the present system of executing the public printing, and of substituting therefor some other system, the committee have unanimously instructed their chairman to report a bill providing for the public printing, binding, engraving, and lithographing.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title; and the Clerk was proceeding to read the bill in extenso, when,

On motion of Mr. GURLEY, it was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GURLEY. I have one or two remarks to make in reference to the bill which has just been referred. This bill is offered, sir, in response to a resolution of this House directing the Committee on Printing to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the present system of executing the public printing, and substituting the "lowest-bidder" system, and to meet the demands of the country for a radical reform in that department of the public service. I will not now enter into a consideration of the multiplied evils of the present system; for they are a subject of general condemnation in both Houses of Congress, and among the people at large. The recent developments at the other end of the Capitol, the use made of the enormous profits of printing, and the facts brought out by various witnesses, have served to deepen the impression in the minds of honest men of all parties that it is our duty to adopt some plan of public printing whereby the Government shall have its work well and faithfully done, with dispatch and economy, and to the exclusion of all speculation, fraud, and corruption.

The resolution which directs our attention to the subject suggests a plan of letting out the work to the lowest bidder. That plan has been fully and fairly tested by Government, and has failed to meet the just expectations of Congress.

It is true, there is an apparent fairness in the lowest-bidder contract system, but the records of the Government show that it has been worse cheated and swindled under that system than any other. Besides, parties who lose money on their contracts will do, and demand of Congress full compensation. Two gentlemen of the city contracted, several years ago, to do the public printing, but alleged, when it was done, that they had lost money, and came to Congress with a claim, and received, by way of compensation, the sum of $70,000. These claims are based upon the principle that the Government must pay its agents honest wages, but I fear that, when some such claims are allowed, they receive double wages. C. Wendell received the printing by contract on the same plan; and it was so badly done that it has been the cause of the revocation of serious contracts. The Superintendent of the Public Printing whether all those works printed by him under that contract should not be reprinted. Other parties once took a contract at twenty per cent. off from the old prices established in 1819; and they came to Congress for compensation, and received $50,000.

Boyd Hamilton took the contract for the printing of one Congress, under the system of letting it out to the lowest bidder, and broke down before the middle of the first session. Congress took the contract from him, and then was adopted the present law upon the subject of the public printing. Experience, therefore, as I have shown, has demonstrated that if persons take contracts for the public printing at a lower rate than they can afford, somebody or some parties are bound to be cheated by the Government, or those who execute the work. Ordinarily, it will be very poorly done; it will be slow of execution; and if losses are sustained by contractors, they are sure to come before Congress, and persist in a demand for compensation; and a good deal more than a fair compensation is generally asked, and often allowed.

In view of these facts, the question arises, why should not the Government do, by its own authorized agents—the principal ones already in office—the whole work, promptly and well, and at honest cost? Why should Congress be troubled and importuned every other year, for weeks and months, by scores of applicants for the place of Public Printer? Why should so much valuable time be lost in the attempt (as was the fact this year) to elect one, not only to the great injury of the public service, but of public morals also, and to the disgust of the whole country? I am confident, sir, that, on the general plan of the bill, the saving to the Government in the cost of printing will be from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars per year, and that the present system of Congress as a test, the gain in the promptitude of its execution, and the saving of time on the part of this body, will be worth half as much more. But I will not now discuss the general subject of public printing. I offer these suggestions, with a view to call special attention to the provisions of the bill before the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand what the gentleman from Ohio has said is a report from his committee.

Mr. GURLEY. Not at all; they are my own conclusions.

Mr. HOUSTON. At what time it is intended that the bill shall go into operation?

Mr. GURLEY. As soon as it is adopted, so far as certain portions of the public printing are concerned.

Mr. HOUSTON. What portion?

Mr. GURLEY. The printing of the Executive Departments, bureaus, &c.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand, then, that the bill which the gentleman has just reported proposes to change the Executive Departments from the printing of the Executive Departments is concerned. I desire to know what bill proposes in relation to the binding?

Mr. GURLEY. The whole subject can be discussed and explained in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I do not propose to go into any discussion at this time.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is true; but the gentleman from Ohio can, nevertheless, answer my question. I understand him to say that his bill only proposes immediate action in relation to the printing of the Departments. Now, what I want to know is, when and how his bill is intended to effect the binding, the engraving, the lithographing, and the printing of Congress.

Mr. GURLEY. The bill will be printed, and the gentleman can then examine it for himself.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman declines to answer my question.

Mr. GURLEY. There is no concealment in relation to the matter. The bill will be printed, and placed in the hands of every member of the House.

Mr. GROW. I call for the previous question upon referring the bill.

THE SPEAKER. The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union before the gentleman from Ohio commenced his remarks. The remarks of the gentleman would not have been in order, if any one had objected.

STENOGRAPHER TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. HASKIN. I rise to a privileged question. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Expenditures to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures, and they are hereby authorized to employ a person to act as clerk and stenographer to said committee.

Mr. HASKIN. I ask for the adoption of that resolution, and call for the previous question upon referring the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. How does that resolution come before the House? It is no question of privilege.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Committee on Public Expenditures were authorized to report the resolution.

Mr. BURNETT. They were authorized to report upon such matters as were referred to them; but not upon such a matter as the employment of a stenographer. Why, sir, the committee has not had a meeting, as I understand, for years, and no present session.

Mr. HASKIN. The gentleman will permit me to say, in reply, that the Committee on Public Expenditures have had the matter of the public printing referred to them, with instructions to inquire into the abuses connected with it, to propose reforms, &c. In pursuance of that special reference, the committee have, for the last week, been examining witnesses, and have had the services of a stenographer, without whom it would be impossible for them to investigate the abuses and accomplish the objects they are expected to attain.

Mr. BURNETT. I appeal to the gentleman from New York to withdraw his demand for the previous question, and allow me to offer an amendment enlarging the powers of that committee, and instructing them to inquire into the expediency of the binding by the Committee on Printing during the present session of Congress.

Mr. HASKIN. I have no objection to that, if the gentleman will propose it at some other time. I do not care to connect it with this resolution.

Mr. BURNETT. I think it will not embarrass the resolution of the gentleman. I should like very much to know how the binding for the present session has been let out by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HINDMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his demand for the previous question.

Mr. BURNETT. I appeal to the gentleman from New York to allow my amendment to come in, so that they may have the whole subject of printing, binding, and engraving before them, to be acted upon by them at one and the same time.

Mr. HASKIN. I suppose that that committee may, under the general power conferred upon it, inquire into that subject without the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BURNETT. Then it will not embarrass the gentleman from New York nor will it embarrass the committee, to put it in. If he wants the country to know the truth, if he desires that they shall know whether or not there have been corruptions, why does he shrink from an investigation into this question?

contemplate the abrogation of the present contracts covering the same service? .

Mr. COLFAX. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that the bill proposes the abrogation of no contracts whatever, but leaves that matter for Congress to determine. It may be that the present contractors may be the lowest bidders under this bill. The bill contains various proposals.

Mr. HOUSTON. It involves important principles.

Mr. PHELPS. I submit a motion that this bill be printed. It can be printed, and laid upon our tables to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. BURNETT. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to offer a resolution, which, in my judgment, will consume but a moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire that I was proceeded to the regular order of business.

Mr. BURNETT. I understood that I was to have the floor when the gentleman from Indiana yielded.

The SPEAKER. It was so stated; and the Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the gentleman from Kentucky should be permitted to introduce the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, if there was such an understanding.

HINDING FOR THE HOUSE.

Mr. BURNETT then, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures inquire into the manner in which the binding of the present Congress has been let out; that they inquire into the manner of bidding for the same; the price at which they proposed to do the work; whether the contracts were made with the lowest bidder, and in accordance with existing laws; and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now insist upon my motion that the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The first bill on the Speaker's table was an act (H. R. No. 216) making appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Ponca Indians, and with certain bands of Indians in the State of Oregon and the Territory of Washington, for the year ending June 30, 1860, with amendments of the Senate; which were taken from the table, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

NEW LAND DISTRICT.

An act (S. No. 90) to create an additional land district in Washington Territory was next taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN, by unanimous consent, reported, from the Committee of Ways and Means, a bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1861; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SHERMAN then referred the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the bill be referred to the standing Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first upon the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, unless it be waived.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not waive my motion.

Mr. STANTON. The motion is in order; and, debatable. I suppose the House might as well settle now, for the residue of the session, what are the legitimate duties of the respective committees of this House. A number of variety of other reforms I desire to see introduced, as that of distributing the business of the House to the respective committees to which, in my judgment, it belongs; and not allow it to be monopolized by one committee, who must of necessity be physically incapable of understanding it.

If there is any use in a Committee on Military Affairs, any Committee on Naval Affairs, any Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, it seems to me it is for the purpose of inquiring into the necessities of these various branches of the public service. Under the practice which has prevailed during the last fifteen or twenty years, all the annual appropriation bills go to the Committee of Ways and Means. It is utterly impossible for that committee to investigate the details of the public service. It is a vast business, and the result has been that the Committee of Ways and Means has become a mere organ of the executive department, to report its estimates. Of necessity they are roused to take these estimates upon the credit of the various Departments of the Government. Now, sir, I believe, if you will distribute these appropriation bills, after they have been made up by the Committee of Ways and Means, upon consultation with the Executive Departments, to the various standing committees of the House which have charge of the various branches of the public service, who are supposed to be acquainted with the respective branches of service with which they are charged, and who are supposed to be competent to investigate the details of any particular branch, we would be enabled to determine with greater accuracy and more certainty what the necessities of the service may be. There is no necessity for this Government spending $80,000,000 annually, as it has done for the last four years. If the Committee of Ways and Means have, upon an investigation of their own, undertaken to reduce this amount $30,000,000, I undertake to say that they have done it without understanding the basis of that reduction. If the service is to be reduced, it is now.

Now, as a member of the Military Committee, I desire to have authority from this House to investigate the expenditures of the military service. I desire an opportunity of looking into the details of the estimates, and comparing them with the various bureaus of the War Department, to know how the appropriations for that Department have been expended during the last year. I want to inquire into the necessities of this service, and to know the expenditures reported by the Committee of Ways and Means are, in fact, necessary. I desire it in the consideration of retrenchment and economy. I desire to for the purpose of reducing the expenditures of the Government to the lowest practicable point.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that I have the authority of my colleague, (Mr. SHERMAN,) as the organ of the Committee on Naval Affairs at the last session of Congress, for the policy which I now propose to adopt in the distribution of the business of the House. This whole subject was discussed in the House at the last session, on the motion of my colleague to refer the annual naval appropriation bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs. My colleague thought it exceedingly unwise, and so I am still of the opinion that I am then entertained. My colleague convinced me by his arguments then, and I have not changed my mind yet. I hope to have my colleague's aid now in sending these bills to the proper committees.

Now, after the refusal of the House to send the naval appropriation bill of last session to the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Military Affairs took the responsibility, without an order of the House, of examining into the Army appropriation bill. Taking a simple printed copy of the bill, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs went to the War Department, and, by personal interviews with the various bureaus of the Department, ascertained that the appropriations for the Army service might be reduced by $1,872,000. Amendments to that effect were proposed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. They were rejected by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I think, almost uniformly. But the House sustained the Committee on Military Affairs, made these reductions, and saved this $1,872,000; and now there is no complaint of any deficiency in the branch of the public service.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly.

Mr. PHELPS. I am satisfied that the gentleman from Ohio does not desire to do any injustice to the Committee of Ways and Means. The estimates submitted during the last session of Congress for the support of the Army were examined by the Committee of Ways and Means, and that committee made considerable reduction on them. The Committee of Ways and Means, which the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs desired to reduce. Some of the proposed reductions were resisted by Mr. The Quartermaster General had informed the House of the Committee on Military Affairs that his estimates for a portion of the expenditure in his department were made under the expectation that there would be a continuous war with the Navajo Indians in the Territory of New Mexico. At the commencement of the session of the Congress, information reached us that peace had been restored with these Indians. In consequence of that fact—not known at the time the estimates were submitted; not known at the time the Committee of Ways and Means acted on these estimates—a reduction of nearly four hundred thousand dollars was made, and made by the sanction of both committees. I am willing to concede that there was a reduction of $1,800,000 on the estimates as submitted by the Secretary of War. Do I not understand that the gentleman from Ohio understood him to say that the Committee on Military Affairs recommended a reduction on the estimates of about one million eight hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. STANTON. No, sir. They recommended that reduction of $1,872,000 on the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, which had been already reduced below the estimates, and the reduction was made through the instrumentality of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I understand him to say that there is no complaint of any deficiency in the military service. That is not all, sir. The Committee on Naval Affairs, with my colleague as its organ, having acquired information, through his agency as member of a special committee to inquire into naval expenditures, moved amendments for the reduction of the bill for the support of the Navy for the coming fiscal year, amounting to $1,575,000. That reduction was proposed to the Committee on Naval Affairs, not on the estimates, but on the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, which the House refused to refer to the Naval Committee. The House sustained the Committee on Naval Affairs, and reduced the appropriations to $3,500,000. I have heard of no complaint of a deficiency in the naval service. These, sir, I believe, were the only two standing committees of the House that took any special charge of the bills reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, making appropriations for their particular departments. By the action of these two committees, and through the instrumentality of service which the House refused to confer on them, and to require of them, nearly four million dollars were saved in these two annual appropriation bills.

The effect of the present system of transacting the business of the House is, to subordinate all the other committees of the House, and to leave them room to do with the essential legislation of the country.

Now, I make this as a test question. If the House choose to commit this Army bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, I take it for granted that it will follow, upon the principle thus adopted, and send the naval appropriation bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Post Office appropriation bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and the diplomatic and consular bill to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, so that each committee will have an opportunity of investigating the bill for its department of the public service.

What has the Committee on Military Affairs done to-day? I certain gentleman has a claim for horses lost in the service of the Government, for one hundred dollars—and that goes to the Committee on Military Affairs. The Committee on Military Affairs is charged with the investigation of private claims arising out of the military service of the country. Now, I hold that the Committee on Military Affairs ought to look into the necessities of the military service.

I ask the Clerk to read the speech made by my necessary to carry out existing laws, and I think the gentleman cannot allow a single instance in which the Committee of Ways and Means have reported appropriations in any general appropriation bill which were not in pursuance of existing laws, or such as were in conformity with the rules under which they act. The appropriations which are reported for the Judiciary are appropriations for the continuance of public works authorized by law. But in no case, so far as I am aware, has the Committee of Ways and Means, while in the discharge of their specific duty of providing the appropriations necessary to carry on the Government, recommended the passage of independent laws. All such laws come within the legitimate jurisdiction of other committees of the House. All such laws relating to the Army should come from the Committee on Military Affairs; all such matters referring to the Navy of the country come properly from the Committee on Naval Affairs; those relating to the postal service of the country from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; those relating to the judiciary of the country from the Committee on the Judiciary; and so on. Other committees are charged with the duty of inquiring into and reporting such laws as are necessary in the particular branches of Government to which, by the rules of the House, their attention is directed.

But, sir, Congress has the right to enact laws when laws are passed, it is necessary that means should be provided for executing the laws of the land. In order to accomplish that purpose, it is proper, it is necessary, that there should be some one committee which should be in constant communication with the Departments, which should receive from them estimates of the appropriations necessary to carry on the Departments of the Government under the existing laws, and to report to the House the appropriations necessary to accomplish that object. Suppose now, if I am to propose the plan of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] were to be carried out—the Committee of Ways and Means, as the organ of the House, receives communications from the Departments, reviews and corrects their estimates, and reports to the House the appropriations necessary; but suppose, I say, that as soon as these bills come into the House they are parcelled out among the various other standing committees of the House—those referring to the military affairs of the Government, to the Committee on Military Affairs, those referring to the Navy, to the Committee on Naval Affairs; those relating to the Post Office service, to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; those making appropriations for carrying on the judiciary of the country, to the Committee on the Judiciary; those relating to Indian affairs, to the Indian Committee, and so on; suppose these bills are thus parcelled out amongst the various committees, and they come here each struggling for the floor, no one having the precedence under the rules; how would you get along with the business of the House?

One word in reference to the argument of economy which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] has made. Does not the gentleman know that the complaint almost universally made against the Committee of Ways and Means is, that their tendency is to reduce the estimates of the Departments rather than to increase them? The Committee of Ways and Means is, and of necessity must be, a conservative committee. They have a general view of all the appropriations asked for to carry on the Government, and they see the whole subject before them, they look around to see in what Department reductions can properly be made. You, Mr. Speaker, know, every member of the House familiar with the course of business here knows, that appropriation bills are almost always increased in the Committee of Ways and Means, and almost always on the motion of the separate committees.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let the plan of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] be carried out, and what will be the result? The Committee of Ways and Means now have the whole responsibility and care of the estimates; but let the Army appropriation bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee will take particular care that the branch of the public service of which it has exclusive charge shall not suffer for want of liberal appropriations; and so it will be with every other committee. Is not that the necessary and inevitable result? Sir, if you will have economy in the public service, you must place all these bills in charge of one committee—a committee which has no more one branch of the Government under its especial care than another.

Again, sir, when these bills, reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, have been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, they are printed and placed in the hands of every member of the House; and it is not only the right of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON], but it is his duty, as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to examine the military appropriation bill in his committee, and see what reduction, if any, can safely be made in the estimates of the Departments, or in the amounts reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. I say it is the duty of that committee to ascertain where reduction can be made; and when the matter comes on in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it is the duty of the gentleman from Ohio, as the organ of the Committee on Military Affairs, to rise and propose his reduction, his amendment, his vote. That he may do so, under the rules; and he will have to further authority under the rules to reduce the expenditures provided for in this bill if his motion prevails, and it is referred to his committee.

Now, sir, if I am to inquire of the gentleman from Maine, who seems to know more about the rules than any one else here, if the Military Committee has any right to propose any amendment to an appropriation bill, as a committee? Have they any power to report an Army appropriation bill? None in the world. As chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, or any other member of that committee, chosen voluntarily to perform labor not devolved upon him by the House, which the House refuses to require at his hands, and which, under its rules, are in the hands of the Committee of Ways and Means, then, it is true, he may incur that labor, and he may, not as the organ of the committee, but the same as any other member of the House, propose amendments in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. As chairman of that committee, I do not intend, as a subordinate of the Committee of Ways and Means, to go out of my way to perform a labor which the House refuses to allow me the responsibility and credit for.

Mr. WASHINGTON, of Maine. Then the gentleman from Ohio will not discharge his entire duty. By the rule which has been read, and by the rules of the House fixing the duties of these different committees, a certain class of the public business is placed in the charge of each. Now, Mr. Speaker, if these committees perform fully the duties assigned them, they will ascertain what reductions in the estimates for the particular service over which they have charge can be safely made, or what increase of appropriation may be made, and they will report to the Committee of Ways and Means, or some other member of the committee, when the bill is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to offer amendments carrying out their views. It is true, he will not be permitted to offer them as the organ of a committee; he will not be permitted to report to the gentleman from Ohio who is the constant practice, stating that he has been instructed by his committee to offer the amendments.

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to say a word on this question.

Mr. WASHINGTON, of Maine. I am under obligation to renew the call for the previous question, and will now yield to hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, if it were true, as the gentleman from Ohio has said, that the Committee of Ways and Means, and by the gentleman from Maine who now holds the floor, that the purpose and powers of the Committee of Ways and Means are merely to bring into this House bills appropriating money for the execution of existing laws, it might be well to consider the propriety of the position they assume, and would admit that the appropriation bills should not be referred as proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON.] But the Committee of Ways and Means is not limited to carrying out existing laws. In point of fact, that committee brings in appropriations which are tantamount to the enactment of new laws. The rule of the House is—

"General appropriation bills shall be in order in preference to any other bills of a public nature, unless otherwise ordered by a majority of the House."

And further:

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bill, or in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless it shall be shown that such expenditure is authorized by law, and that such law is already in force, and that the objects are already in progress, and for the continuation of carrying on the several departments of the Government."

You will perceive, Mr. Speaker, what may be the effect under that rule. It is not whether there is a previous law, but, under the latter clause of the rule, "whether such public works are already in progress." If, many years ago, a public work was commenced for the improvement of the Red river, for instance, and no appropriation of $10,000 was made for that purpose, and the work is once put "in progress," the year after the Committee of Ways and Means might bring in an appropriation for the same purpose for $20,000; the next year for $30,000; and so on, till the first appropriation being made, and the work once "in progress," the committee afterwards, at each Congress, taken the initial step, and by attaching an appropriation, really enacts a new law; and if not a new law, then a new appropriation, the effect of which is to continue the public work which may have become perfectly useless, or was never intended to be prolonged. In that way the so-called improvements upon the Mississippi rapids have been carried on for twenty years, prolonging efforts on erroneous plans, and expending hundreds of thousands of dollars which, in my judgment, are entirely useless. I cannot believe the appropriations would have been made to carry on a fallacious plan, if a new and careful examination of the matter had been entered into by a competent standing committee. The appropriations have been made from time to time, without such reference; because, under the provision of the rules of the House which I have referred to, the Committee of Ways and Means may each year, or at any time, bring in upon one of their bills an appropriation of $10,000, without any knowledge of a previous law or plan, but merely on the fact of the work having been "in progress," and on a general supposition that progression must be perpetuated. I mention this as an instance, not to give particulars, but to show how error may be perpetuated. If, after a careful examination inquired into, it might be ascertained that the appropriation was entirely needless. That committee initiates these new appropriations under estimates from the several Departments.

This is especially dangerous as it applies to appropriations for military duties. If, twenty or thirty years ago, a fortification were commenced, that committee, under estimates from the Department, may from year to year bring in appropriations to carry it on toward completion, although the necessity for it has long since passed. The money would materially change the necessity. The committee, then, does not only provide for the execution of existing laws; for, sir, if an appropriation for a certain thing was made twenty years ago, it would seem that they have power to renew it from year to year, without any appropriation, and new works may be started and carried on without limitation or due consideration. Congress may make an appropriation for some road to-day, or for some bridge, supposing that ten or twenty thousand dollars would be sufficient to accomplish their duty. Afterward, the Committee of Ways and Means may from year to year bring in different additional appropriations for the same work. They may prolong expenditures of the Government, and sometimes to a ruinous and unfortunate extent, in my opinion.

Mr. Speaker, I would now say to the gentleman from Maine who now holds the floor, and proper that all of these bills should be referred, each to its appropriate committee. That course may protract the proceedings of the House, but, sir, we are here to legislate for the country, and it is the duty of the House to see that the legislation of that purpose ought to have our approval. If these bills are referred—the Indian bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Army bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, and so on—and the appropriate committees are required to examine into the separate items of appropriations, I think, sir, that there would each year be a large saving of Congress, he must allow the Executive himself to exercise his discretion as to the being printed, and not require it to be delivered by him to any one other than the two Houses of Congress; and then he may communicate it to Congress, having kept it under his own control. The message cannot be taken away from him, by any law we may pass, in advance of the delivery to the two Houses. We have no authority, under the Constitution, to require him to deliver his information, whether in a written message or otherwise, to the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House.

Again, it is suggested to me, by a friend upon my left, that it is not really, and cannot be, a message of the President of the United States, until it is communicated to the House.

There may be, and often will be, other grave reasons why the contents of the message itself should be withheld from the public, and remain in the exclusive possession and under the sole control of the Executive, until the Senate and the House are ready to receive it.

Again, Mr. Speaker, we have, at this session, adopted a principle which, I presume, is a good one, in ordering the accompanying documents to be printed. The principle is, that statistical matter should be omitted in printing certain documents. But who must judge of the matter to be omitted? Your Printing Committee, I judge of it. Are you willing to pass a law by which you will take from the Committees on Printing the supervision of the documents, and allow the Clerk of this House and the Secretary of the Senate to say what shall be omitted in the President's message and accompanying documents, and what shall be printed? It appears to me that this is a dangerous and very extraordinary innovation on the practice of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to correct a misapprehension into which the House has fallen. The bill itself defines what documents shall be printed; that is, the message of the President and the reports of the heads of Departments and bureaus, without any statistical information. The bill provides, just as the resolution of my colleague (Mr. GREGG) provided the other day, what documents are to be printed.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is one objection which I have to the bill, that it does so provide; because it may be important that some of the statistical information which accompanies the President's message should be printed for the use of the two Houses; but this bill refuses all such information. That seems to me to be a fatal objection. Much of the statistical information which accompanies the President's message might be omitted, and I think should be omitted, in the extra numbers; but much of it is essential, and ought to be printed. But again: I suppose the gentleman from Ohio does not intend to include within the operation of this law the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. That is generally the most important document.

Mr. SHERMAN. The estimates themselves are printed and published under just such a title.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes; the estimates are printed; but the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which contains information of the state of the finances, is not printed; and this bill does not provide for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That report is sent to us directly.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is true. It is sent to us directly; and therefore I say that this bill does not include it, and under its provisions that document will not be printed. That is the most important information connected with our legislation at the beginning of a session of Congress, for the reason that we need, and that document gives us, information of the state of the Treasury, of the finances, of the condition of the public debt, of the revenue, of the annual and current receipts. We want all this information as soon as we commence our session's legislation. It seems to me, therefore, that this bill omits the most important part which ought to be printed, if it may be printed. But I believe it is all wrong, and the bill ought not to become a law.

Again, sir, the Postmaster General does not, as I understand it, send his report to the President. It is sent to Congress, so that the report must be included expressly, if it is to be included at all. It is not included in the gentleman's bill. And thus we see that the bill applies to but very little of the public business about which we need information, and which is material or important for Congress to have at an early period. It is important that the estimates should be printed, so that the House and the Senate may take them up early and examine them; and, under a joint resolution, the estimates are to be printed and on our table at the beginning of each session. Then, if there is to be any improvement at all, it seems to me the greatest improvement would be to have the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which is the most directly important Congress, printed as a report which is to be read and laid on our table at the beginning of each session. We have the power to change the existing law which thus directs and causes it to be printed, yet I doubt the wisdom of even that change. But when you propose to make the President of the United States submit his report to anybody except to the two Houses of Congress, you undertake to do what, in my judgment, you have no constitutional power to do. If you desire it to be printed, you must authorize the President of the United States to lay it on the table, and retain it until Congress assembles. That the President can now have his message printed, if he desires to do so, before he sends it to Congress, and may make its contents as public as he may choose; it is his document until sent to Congress; the public has a right to be informed of its contents—and is no longer under his control.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understand that the object of the bill is simply to provide a means by which the information necessary for the action of Congress may be printed, so that members may have it before the assembling of Congress. Under the action of this bill, it strikes me that it ought to be modified in one particular, to meet the objection which my friend from Alabama has spoken of. The bill begins by declaring that "it shall be the duty of the President" to do so and so. Under the Constitution, the President is directed to give information to both Houses of Congress with regard to the state of the Union; and it is his peculiar privilege to discharge that duty in accordance with the decision of his own judgment. It strikes me that the suggestion made by my friend from Alabama deserves consideration; that the bill should be changed, so that, instead of making use of the word of command, it shall declare that the President is authorized to make such a publication, or have such a document printed, as, in his judgment, will be useful in the management of the public business. With that modification, I cannot see any objection to the bill. I therefore suggest that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the gentleman proposing that amendment. I have no authority to do it myself, as the bill is the unanimous report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then I propose the amendment, that the words "the President be authorized and requested" be inserted in lieu of the words "it shall be the duty of the President."

The SPEAKER. The motion to commit the bill must be withdrawn before it will be in order to amend. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his motion to recommit?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana now offers an amendment.

Mr. BRANCH. I have hastily prepared an amendment, which I will read. It may, perhaps, meet the views of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means:

That so much of the documents accompanying the President's annual message as he shall deem proper to deliver to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in advance of the meeting of Congress, and the annual and current receipts, now prescribed by law for the printing and distributing of documents ordered by Congress.

If that amendment meets the views of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I think it will be acceptable to the House. I think that it is a very proper amendment, altogether too peremptory. It might cause information to be divulged which it would be proper to divulge. My amendment only refers to the documents accompanying the message; not to the annual and current receipts. I do not refer to this House or for Congress to call on the President to cause his message to be made public in advance of its delivery to the two Houses of Congress.

In addition to that, it would be an assumption of power on the part of Congress to prescribe the manner in which the President shall communicate with Congress. The Constitution says he shall give us, from time to time, information on the state of the Union. He has a right to communicate that information to us in such form as he may think proper. In the early history of the Government, we know that the President came to Congress, and communicated to Congress in person. Forty years ago, the President has been in the habit of communicating in writing. He has a right to communicate in whatever way he thinks proper; and I think that any bill which undertakes to prescribe the manner in which he shall communicate with us, which requires that he shall do so in writing, and that his message shall be printed in advance, will be, to say the least of it, a violation of good taste, if not of principle. I therefore now, with the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, offer this as an amendment.

Mr. CLEMENS. I am in favor, Mr. Speaker, of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina; and, if I can have the attention of the House for a few moments, I would like to satisfy the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that the amendment ought to be adopted. I have no objection to the amendment, clearly the views that strike me in regard to the original proposition and to the proposed amendment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the language of the Constitution is, that the President shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information on the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. It is not necessary for me to elaborate the points which the gentleman from North Carolina has presented.

The great objection in the first clause of this bill, it strikes me, is, that it prescribes the mode in which the President shall communicate to Congress; and it goes still further than that—it prescribes that he shall communicate at the command of Congress.

Now, we know, from two remarkable examples, that there may be no Congress of the United States, constitutionally organized, for months after the session commences. And in what condition do you place the affairs of the country, if you suspend the President's power to communicate to Congress, in advance, before the country and the world, the most delicate questions of foreign and domestic policy.

The framers of the Constitution contemplated the English mode of communicating with Congress—that is, by address in person; and the gentleman from North Carolina has well remarked, that in the early period of the Government that mode was adopted. It was Mr. Jefferson who, for the first time in the history of the Government, communicated with Congress by message.

He did it for his own convenience, because he had none of the graces of the orator, while he had the graces of the pen; and he preferred to communicate to Congress through the pen, instead of that ready instrument, the tongue. It was the first instance in which Mr. Jefferson introduced into the Government, and it certainly was not the best.

However that may be, sir, I am opposed to the original provision of the bill, for the reasons given by the gentleman from North Carolina, as well as that which I have indicated, and which is, in brief, that we possess no constitutional power to prescribe the mode in which the President shall communicate such considerations of public policy as he thinks proper to this body. I shall therefore, in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think this discussion has gone far enough; and I call the previous question.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I think this is a bill of such importance in its principles and in its effects, that it should be written into the record under the previous question at this speed. I wish to submit a few remarks in regard to its bearings. I do not intend to protract the debate, nor do I intend to submit an elaborate argument.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I will withdraw the demand for a previous question, and I will recommit the bill, so as to give the gentleman from New York an opportunity of being heard; but I do trust that we shall pass the bill this evening, and go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I will renew the demand for the previous question, if it is desired.

Mr. FLORENCE. I trust not. I trust I shall have an opportunity to discuss the merits of the bill. I should like to say a word or two.

Mr. BRANCH. Do I understand that my amendment has been received?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's amendment has been received.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Mr. Speaker, I deem that the bill and all the amendments offered to it are offensive to reason and open to constitutional objection. It is not every evil that exists that can be perfectly corrected. The corrective, if it exists, is not always readily to be found. As many evils are created by attempts at reform as exist before the efforts to create it; and it is well known that in the track of reforms—nominally such—follow more evils, more oppressions, than those which they are instituted to remove. If, sir, in this instance, circumstances arise which create an evil the mode prescribed by the Constitution for the President to communicate to Congress, unless that evil can be readily and constitutionally corrected, a greater one will be inflicted by the attempt to remedy it than by submitting to the original. It is necessary that we should know it is often equally necessary that we submit to them; and where they are irremediable, it is the part of wisdom to submit with patience.

Now, here, in the first section of this bill, it is made the duty of the President to cause his message and the accompanying documents, as far as practicable, to be printed, and copies of the same to be delivered to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives in time for distribution at the commencement of each session. It is also made the constitutional duty of the President to communicate the message here contemplated to "the Congress." Now, sir, Congress may not be ready to receive that message at the beginning of the session. The House was not ready at the commencement of the present session. What, then, under the provisions of this bill, would have been the duty of the President of the United States? Why, evidently, to communicate the message to the Secretary of the Senate and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives. What has been a constant complaint of "the Congress"? Certainly not. It follows, then, that the President would not, in such case, have been performing his constitutional duty.

I am unwearied that, in such a case, under this bill, he would have been performing his duty under the law of the land. But how, sir, can we place in conflict with the Constitution the law of the land? That is an objection which I should like to hear answered by the gentleman from Ohio. It is unanswerable, sir; and I take the position here, in fact, that this bill, and the constitutional section of the bill is unconstitutional, and should be declared, by our judiciary, void.

But I am answered by the gentlemen who propose these amendments, that this difficulty will be obviated by adopting a different phraseology for the bill; and that, in the interest of the President—making it his duty to communicate to Congress—it may be placed at his option. What, sir, shall we place it at the option of the President of the United States to perform his constitutional duty, or not? If the Constitution has decided that it shall be his duty to communicate to "the Congress," shall we give him the option or choice of communicating to a Clerk? Why, no, sir; it is as clear as light that this is an unconstitutional provision; and change your phraseology as you may, declare your principle as you may, you cannot escape the barrier which the Constitution has erected in its path; so that, when the President of the United States performs this high function of his office, he shall perform it to no body less than himself, and that body either the Senate or the House of Representatives of the United States.

But gentlemen claim that because such evils are entailed, because of differences of opinion upon the floor, because of an impossibility, at times, to organize this House, so that gentlemen then cannot and do not comfortably complete the message and documents in time for the dispatch of its business, therefore they will override the barrier which the Constitution has erected; therefore they will elevate to the dignity of the House of Representatives and of the Senate one or more of their subordinate officers! Why, sir, upon what times have we failed? Where shall we look, in the course of events, for the remnants of our Constitution, if this course of legislation is to prevail?

Sir, there is not a letter, there is not a colon, there is not a dash of the pen in that instrument that should be violated by any action of this House, lawfully premeditated, or under whatever deliberation it may be considered.

Am I told, then, sir, that, for the public convenience, the President of the United States shall be at liberty to construct a message, that he shall couch that message in writing, that he shall commit that message to print, and from that print that he shall be empowered to communicate to certain officials here?

I can well understand how, when an individual author composes, his pen is held in strict confinement by his mind. In this mental engagement the author is so completely absorbed that he is almost assistants to his aid; but when he invokes the instrumentality of type, the inviolability of this confidential relation is destroyed, and the message goes to the printer; it goes not to the House, but the printer is erected into the representative of the President and the House is subordinated to the type-setter.

But I am told that it will be in order to print the documents accompanying the message, and that thus the difficulty will be avoided. Why, sir, the circle of clerical action necessary to the completion of the message is not perfect till the paper has arrived at this House. Till then it is not entitled to the dignity of message. Should the messenger from the White House stumble in his course through the avenue to the House, and the documents tumble with him, would it be the message of the President of the United States? Think you that would lie covered with the dirt and filth of the street? [Laughter.] Why, no, sir; it would not be the message of the President until delivered; and then delivered to the coordinate branch of the Government—"the Congress." It is then that the President's message goes forth to the country. Goes forth, how? As an essay of a professor, as the opinion of a public officer? No, sir; it goes forth under the sanction of a truth told by the Constitution to a high representative body, and it is clothed with the sanction and authority not only of the President, but also of the body to which it is addressed. You cannot disrobe the message thus delivered of its authority. It then becomes a record of State; and a record of State alone is that the people of the United States contemplate and receive it. The message of the President before delivery is of no more authority than a newspaper article, subject, if you please, to committees of investigation of fifteen members, to the most unscrupulous charges of fraud; but who ever heard of a message of the President of the United States received by a House that was investigated, save in Committee of the Whole? Now my friend from North Carolina seeks to exempt from the operation of this argument the documents accompanying the message.

Mr. BRANCH. The gentleman has misunderstood the purport of my amendment, which proposes to exempt from the operation of the bill the message only, and allow it to apply to such accompanying documents as the President shall see proper to communicate. I stated expressly that I did not think it would be proper for the House to make it imperative on the President to communicate his message, and therefore my amendment was so drawn as to exclude the messenger from the operation of the bill.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Certainly; so I understood the honorable member; but my argument is directed to the point that my friend from North Carolina can accomplish nothing by the distinction, and which depends upon the consideration that there is no constitutional line of separation between the message and the documents that accompany it.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to say one word at this point?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR. The gentleman from New York has taken what seems to me a most extraordinary position. He raises the matter now before the House to the dignity of a constitutional question. Does not the gentleman remember that it has been the practice, during at least a quarter of a century, for the President of the United States to have his message printed before Congress meets, and not only that, but to have it placed in the course of transmission to all the important points in the United States? That, sir, is the practice on the part of the President; and what is the object of the House aimed at at this time? It is not to compel the President to discharge his duty; it is not to impose upon him an obligation to do this or that; it is simply to confer upon the President of the United States the authority to have a certain amount of printing done at a particular time, for the convenience of those who act with him in the transaction of the public business. We all know that printing is to be done at some period, and we know that the public affairs inconvenience in consequence of the delay to which it is now subjected, for the President has not now the discretionary power to have it done at the public expense, at a period which would suit the convenience of members of Congress. I do not see how any constitutional question arises. To my mind, it presents merely one of expediency. It proposes merely to confer an authority, which it is within the discretion of the President to exercise or not, as his views of the public interest may dictate. It is a measure of expediency which must be done at some time, may be done, if he sees fit to direct it, at a time which will enable the Representatives of the people to go into the discharge of their duty from the very moment in which the assembly in Congress.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. My friend from Louisiana declares that he is unable to appreciate the manner in which this rises to the dignity of a constitutional question. I am sorry that my friend from Louisiana is unable to appreciate his own able argument, and is unable to see the facts more than the facts he has so clearly presented, to show that it is indeed a constitutional argument which I am addressing to the House, and which erects its formidable front in opposition to the bill now before us. Sir, the message of our President, the President of the United States, is undivided. But it is printed under the sanction of Congress. It is distributed to certain points, but under an inviolable promise that it shall not be disclosed; and it is only when the electric spark conveys the fact to all parts of the Union that the President's message, as the House of Representatives, or to the Senate, that the word "delivered" authorizes it to be disclosed to the public.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman from New York allow me a word?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Pardon me now. I hope my friend from Louisiana will allow me to proceed with my argument continuously; at this point, in answer to the views which he has presented. Sir, there is a moral in his argument, and that moral is, that the President, under the Constitution and laws of the land, the President of the United States does not deem that he is authorized to disclose the contents of his message, or that he is authorized to publish it as a message, till delivered; and if he here considered that the President's message is a communication upon his constitutional duty, I call upon my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COVOC], and upon my friend and colleague from New York, [Mr. HOAR], to raise each an investigation upon his conduct, and let us ask him for an unconstitutional disclosure of his duties. Sir, he is not liable to this objection. He is liable to this praise, and entitled to this applause, that he has done, and that he continues to do, his duty strictly under the Constitution and the laws of the land. I will now listen to no friend from Louisiana.

Mr. TAYLOR. I merely wish to ask the gentleman from New York a question. He has said that the practice which has obtained with the Presidents of the United States to have their messages printed was justifiable, because the Chief Magistrate of the Union authorized those who printed them to print them under an injunction of secrecy.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. One moment. Let me set my friend right in his premises. I did not say that it was justifiable. I was saying that the practice of the President, as alleged in support of the argument he advanced.

Mr. TAYLOR. Allow me to proceed. It has, sir, certainly been the practice, almost since the commencement of sending written messages. The gentlemen from New York, I have no doubt, has hitherto approved it. We know, however, that occasionally he changes from. He has treated us to evidences of that fact frequently.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Now, sir, since the change from the Buffalo platform. [Great laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR. I had not the slightest allusion to that change.

But to proceed. [At practice, Mr. Speaker, which the whole country expects to be continued; that practice heretofore justified by the whole country; that practice which the Presidents of the United States have all adopted, and up to this time without censure; if that practice which is commended for the mere gratification of the public appetite for an early communication of the message, can be adopted with propriety by the President, I should like to know from that gentleman why Congress may not furnish the means to the President of adopting a similar practice for the public interest, which is the early publication of the particular documents in question?]

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. My answer to that is simply this: my friend from Louisiana misunderstands or overlooks the distinction I take. The point to which I address my remarks is to the constitutional position of an officer of the Government in the discharge of his duty. That which my friend has been addressing his remarks to, is as to the discretion of that same officer in the discharge of that same duty. In this case we are authorizing the officer, and ordering him how to discharge that duty. In the case put by my friend from Louisiana, we have an instance of the discharge of a duty according to the individual discretion of the officer upon whom that duty devolves. I may, or may not, justify the practice which has hitherto existed; but it is justifiable or not, commendable or to be praised, is not a question which rises to the level of the consideration which we have before us. The consideration we have here is this: whether we, as the law-making power of the Government, will declare that the President is discharging his constitutional duty when he is delivering his message to the printer; after the printer, to the Clerk of this House, instead of to the House of Representatives itself.

Now, sir, I come briefly to the consideration of that branch of the argument which has been alluded to by my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. BLANCH.] I am unable to see, and so must every one here, the distinction between the message and the documents which accompany it. A document can have no position, no sanction, except those which the message gives it. It is the appendage, the tail of the message. It has its sanction, its power, its intelligibility, only by means of the message. To divide the accompanying documents from the message, would be to deny to them as it would be fatal to rupture the ligament which binds the Siamese twins together. [Laughter.] That disposes of the argument of my friend from North Carolina.

Let the House well consider, let it ponder upon the work which is put before it to do, to treat, to have, sir, seen the Constitution wounded; I have seen it down-trodden; I have seen it torn piece from piece; but these were done in the hour of excitement done by the heedless masses, or by the violence of instant passion. I trust, I am said that the House of Representatives, in its cool reason and dispassionate judgment, deliberately decided, for a mere convenience, a mere saving of hours, which might well be bestowed upon the official work of those who stand upon the patient lamb to permit the Constitution to be oppressed, and the pillars upon which the privileges of this people rest be shattered by a ruffian blow.

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Speaker, I submit to the judgment of the gentleman from New York. With meekness and with fear, I would not approach this subject. I confess that I cannot, however, evoke, as the gentleman has done on this occasion, "gorgons and hydra and chimeras dire." I see in this bill, when amended as I shall suggest, one of those salutary reforms which, I believe, will pervade the whole body of our legislative duty. The practice proposed by the bill, is so far as my experience extends, the one now pursued. The message of the President of the United States is printed in advance of the meeting of Congress. The documents accompanying that message are all printed in advance, and I think, made public in advance. I think that as soon as Congress assembles, those documents are placed in the hands of the Senate and printed for the use of the Departments. Even, sir, in advance of the delivery of the President's message, it is easy to procure a copy of any of the documents accompanying it, from a head of a Department. We are not, therefore, abandoning any principle, we are giving the hands and brains of the nation long usage. Hence the charge of unconstitutionality which the gentleman makes falls to the ground, "unwarranted, unhonored, and unsound." [Laughter.] Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Repeat that, Tom. Mr. FLORENCE. I said, sir, that if my argument is truthful, and I believe it to be, the constitutional objection of the gentleman falls to the ground, "unwarranted, unhonored, and unsound." [Great laughter.]

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I am unable to appreciate a hand or a friend's argument.

Mr. FLORENCE. He was not listening to it. If he had heard it all, he would surely have appreciated it. He now only wants to criticize the poetry, and not the facts or arguments.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I am not sure my friend not only that his arguments are above and beyond criticism, but his poetry is above reproach. I do not appreciate his argument, but I do feel his poetry. [Laughter.] And sir, though I cannot yield to his logic, I yield to his blank— [The gentleman recited a verse, which he has here recited.] [Laughter.]

Mr. FLORENCE. There is a deal of force in the gentleman's intimation—in that airy, sarcastic manner which is so strikingly characteristic of him. I am much obliged to the gentleman that he has made the case and not the verse. I take that commendation as a personal one, and permit the verse to run along to take care of itself as it best may.

Now, I suggest that this section may be retained, in order of requiring the President to communicate these documents. If it is offensive, unconstitutional, and illegal, to require the President to do so, let us request the President to cause his annual message and accompanying documents, so far as practicable—and I think generally so, to be printed in advance of the meeting of Congress, and with this further fact, patent and known to every one, that the President of the United States did communicate these documents to this House a month before it was organized.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in reference to that branch of the argument I have no more to say. But there is, in my judgment, a fatal objection to this bill which gentlemen have not looked at, I think, as statesmen ought to look at it, and I am of this kind. Under this specious and, unfortunately, popular cry of economy, there has been a provision inserted in this bill to emasculate those important documents, which ought to be published and distributed all over the land, in order that the people might be informed of the doings and transactions of the Government in this metropolis—a provision to deprive the people of this valuable statistical information. I briefly referred to this fact when the bill was introduced by the Committee on Printing. I am sure that the time of the House was to interpose an objection to that feature of the bill. I am in favor of the general principle of the bill. I believe its adoption would be a great saving of public time and money, and would be a great saving of the dignity of the executive department, or of its constitutional privileges. But I would extend to the people all the information I could in relation to the workings of this Government of ours. We have done away with the extravagance of the public printing, so called—though I never participated in objections to it, or to any means of distributing information to the people—and all those documents which produced so large an expenditure of the public money have been printed, and the bills paid. Now the only documents of any size we print are the President's message and accompanying documents, and the mechanical and agricultural parts of the Patent Office reports. Now if we were to distribute one hundred thousand copies of the message and accompanying documents in full, so that every one in the land might be informed of the workings of this Government, it would, in my judgment, be true economy. Hence I have an objection to this emasculation of these documents. But yet, while the amendment I have suggested to the first section of this bill, I am willing to take it, with the documents intact and complete. I believe it will be a great saving of public time. I believe if we had the message and documents before us earlier in the session, commencing with the first Congress, I believe I would have an opportunity to study them more thoroughly, and would be better prepared to perform their duties, and to act more intelligently upon the appropriation bills, and other matters which demand their consideration.

I trust the House will give consideration to the suggestion I have made, in reference to depriving our constituents of that information which we ought to communicate to them. I trust there will not be an abatement of a single line of the documents which accompany the message. I would be willing to vote for the bill if it could be made what I desire it to be, and I, indeed, shall be willing to vote for it, if it cannot be made such, on the ground that it would be the inauguration of a salutary reform, if the gentleman's constitutional objection could be waived in the construction of the first section of the bill.

But I trust the documents may go out to the people full and complete, and not a compilation of them, which might deprive our constituents of just information, which ought to be communicated to them; which might communicate to them that which has no practical value, to inform them fully of the operations of the Government.

Mr. DOCKOCK. Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House but a few moments in explaining the reason why I can vote neither for the bill, as presented by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, nor for the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BLANCH.] The Constitution of the United States, Mr. Speaker, says that the President of the United States shall, from time to time, give Congress information in relation to the state of the nation. Custom has brought it about, that at the beginning of each session of Congress the President of the United States deliver a message. He is not bound to do so. There is nothing which makes it incumbent on him to deliver his message on the opening of each session of Congress. It is within his discretion. The Constitution of the United States does not require him to do so. The President shall give us information in relation to the state of the Union. I will do nothing, sir, which shall say to the President of the United States, "We recognize this custom as the common law of the land, which you are bound to conform to. You must give us a message on the opening of each session, whether you think it necessary or not." Neither will I, Mr. Speaker, dictate to the President of the United States to whom he shall send his message. I will not say to him in his message to send to the Clerk of this House, or the Secretary of the Senate. On the contrary, I would say that the President should be in conformity with the spirit of the Constitution. The message must be made to us. I will do nothing, I say, to mar it of its fair proportions, and change it from a message to Congress, into a communication to one of our officers. I say that the arguments submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] have, in my opinion, a great deal of weight in them, and they go as well to the bill itself as to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1859.

NEW SERIES.—No. 68.

What, sir, are these accompanying documents? They are matters constituting a part of the President's message in fact; giving information in relation to the state of the nation. The President of the United States calls upon the heads of the different Departments to furnish him with information as to the condition of those Departments. He can keep these communications to himself. He chooses, however, in conformity with the spirit of the Constitution, and in order to give us information, to communicate those documents to us, and thus they become a part of his message. I say I will not change the character of them from being a part of his message into a communication to the officers of this House. I will not require that they shall go forth under the sanction of the officers of this House before the character of the message is stamped and declared by its being pronounced in this House. It must be a message to Congress. It must be a communication to Congress, and therefore it must be made in the official way to the House of Representatives.

I say, then, that I will not go for anything which requires the message to be distributed before it is communicated in the usual way to this House; nor will I do anything that requires the accompanying documents, what in my opinion constitute a part of the message, to be distributed before they are laid before the House of Representatives. I am perfectly willing to do this; and this is as far as I will go: I am willing to authorize the President of the United States, if he should think proper, to have in his hands the accompanying documents, or the accompanying documents themselves, or any portion of the accompanying documents, printed in advance, so that when the message is sent to the House, the charge of the communication of a message to Congress shall be stamped and declared by its being here; and that then those things may be distributed more speedily.

It is an evil, as gentlemen declare, that we cannot have these accompanying documents printed sufficiently early in the course of the session to make them as useful as they ought to be in getting up the business of the House. That is an evil; and I would desire to remedy that evil as far as I could, in a constitutional and sensible way. I am willing to give to the President of the United States authority to have printed, by the Public Printer, his message and the accompanying documents, as he may think proper; keeping them all the time under his control, and giving them neither to the Secretary of the Senate nor to the Clerk of the House; distributing them to nobody; but keeping them as he now keeps his messages which he has printed at his private expense, under his own control, and which is distributed to nobody; so that, when the message is delivered here, when it becomes a message, when it becomes a communication to the House of Representatives, the Senate of the United States, the printing might be in an advanced condition, and that the message and the accompanying documents might be speedily delivered. In conformity with this idea, I have drawn up an amendment in this form:

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States, That the President of the United States be authorized to cause his annual message and accompanying documents, or, if he thinks better, the said documents alone, to be printed, in advance of any part of the session of Congress, so that, on delivery of said message, any, with the accompanying documents, be more speedily delivered among the members in the manner now prescribed by law.

That resolution, I believe, conforms to the views of my friend from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move the previous question.

Mr. GROW. Will the gentleman withdraw his motion for one moment, to enable me to propose an amendment? I propose to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia by striking out the words "or any part of them," so that it will read, "may print the said documents alone." I will agree to the gentleman's amendment with that modification.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will hear the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GROW. It is, that the President may print the message, or, if he thinks it advisable, the documents accompanying it; but not allowing him to print a part of them. I prefer that the documents should be all printed, or none of them. I would leave it to his discretion to print all of them, or none.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now renew the previous question.

Mr. BARKSDALE. In order that the bill may be perfected, I move to recommit it to the Committee of Ways and Means. Half a dozen amendments have been offered to it.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw the previous question in order that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury may be also included.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that it is included.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I understand that it is not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must insist on the previous question.

Mr. GARTRELL. I move to lay the bill upon the table, and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BURNETT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on Mr. GARTRELL's motion; and it was decided in the negative by yeas 107, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashmun, Avery, Bonham, Boutwell, Briggs, Church, Burnett, John B. Clark, Clemens, Clifton, Cobb, John Cochran, James Craig, John G. Davis, Dr. John Edmundson, Garrett, Hamilton, Harbison, John T. Harris, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Kilgore, Lamar, Lawrence, Locke, Logan, Love, Robert S. McLean, McQuinn, McQuinn, McQuinn, Miller, Montgomery, Lohan T. Moore, Sydenham, Moore, Knott, Peyton, Pryor, Rogers, Rutledge, Scott, Simon, William N. Smith, Seward, Sherman, Underwood, Vance, Walcott, and Wright—54.

NAYS—Messrs. Charles F. Adams, Green Adams, Adamson, Alexander, Anderson, Bingham, Blair, Blake, Bockee, Boyce, Buchanan, Chase, Britton, Bullfinch, Burlingame, Burroughs, Carey, Case, Collins, Cocking, Cusack, Crawford, Curry, Cutler, H. Walter Davis, Deane, Deland, Dodd, Dunn, Eliot, Eldridge, Perry, Florence, Foster, French, Garrett, Gresham, Grove, Gayley, Hale, Hall, J. Morrison Horne, Harkin, Hutton, Hiram, Howard, Hottel, Homan, Humphreys, Hutton, Irvine, Junkin, Francis W. Kellogg, William Kellogg, DeWitt C. Leach, James M. Leach, Lee, Leomin, Lovejoy, Mallory, Marston, Maynard, McKean, McKnight, McPherson, Millard, Moorhead, Morrill, Edward Jay Morris, Morse, Nelson, Noble, Noyes, Olin, Pennington, Perry, Pettit, Foster, Potter, Pugh, Reynolds, Rice, Rice, Christopher Robinson, Ross, Sevier, Sevier, Sherman, Simpson, Spenser, Stokes, Tappan, Taylor, Thayer, Thacker, Tompkins, Train, Trimble, Vallandigham, Van Wyck, Walton, Eliza B. Washburn, Leroy Washburn, Webster, Wells, Wilson, Woodson, and Woodruff—107.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

During the call,

Mr. HAMILTON, when his name was called, said: Not being one of the favorites who can obtain the floor at any time, however many of our gentlemen may get it, I avail myself of my name being called to say that I have nothing to expect from the magnanimity of those favorites who can get the floor whenever they please. I simply wanted to make this statement. I vote "ay."

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman refers to me, as I obtained the floor—

Mr. HAMILTON. You obtained the floor after I was upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply desire to say that I am not a favorite. I am here on equal of any gentleman on the floor. I claim no superior rights, and do not allow gentlemen to—

Mr. HAMILTON. You cannot help it, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman intends to interrupt my speech—

Mr. HAMILTON. I said exactly what I meant. I say I had the floor before you had it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It became my duty to call the previous question; and I was urged to do so by friends upon the other side of the House. I did my duty, and I intend to do so.

Mr. MILES stated that Mr. KURTZ was paired off with some gentleman on the other side.

Mr. MARSTON. He is paired with Mr. Edwards.

Mr. LARRABEE, when his name was called, said: I shall vote to lay the bill upon the table, for these reasons: first, that it is mandatory on the President, and secondly—

Mr. BINGHAM. Debate is not in order, and I object to it.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order during the vote.

Mr. LARRABEE. I am not debating. I am only giving the reasons for my vote; [cries of "Order!"] and one of our men who was fit to be President could obey such a mandate.

[Renewed cries of "Order!"]

Mr. BINGHAM. I insist that that is debate, and I object to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is not in order.

Mr. LARRABEE. If I am out of order, I do not desire to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order. There can be no debate pending the vote.

Mr. LARRABEE. Very well, sir; I vote "ay."

Mr. POTTLE stated that he had paired for the remainder of the day with Mr. ENGLISH.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, stated that Mr. DAYTON had paired with Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. COX stated that his pair with Mr. ESKRATOR would not expire until to-morrow morning.

The result of the vote having been announced, as above recorded, the question recurred upon securing the yeas and nays for the previous question.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I think this bill ought to include the finance report. As it does not include it, I hope the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARKSDALE] will accept an addition to his amendment.

Mr. FLORENCE. I think there is a provision of law now governing the printing of the finance report.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is pending as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BRANCH].

Mr. BARKSDALE. I cannot imagine why it is important to pass this bill now; and, as several amendments have been offered, it strikes me that the best plan to adopt would be to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the previous question be seconded.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I believe I had the floor.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I supposed the gentleman from Ohio had finished his remarks. I did not intend to interfere with him.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I want first to have the previous question withdrawn, so that my amendment may be introduced in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the previous question be seconded.

Mr. BARKSDALE. An amendment to the bill cannot be offered after the previous question is seconded.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question, to enable my colleague to get in his amendment.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. The amendment I desire to offer is as follows:

And also, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the report on the finance, made by him, made by act of May 10, 1850, to be printed, and copies thereof delivered to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in time for distribution at the commencement of each session, in the manner prescribed by law for the distribution of documents ordered to be printed by Congress.

The estimates are already so printed, and this covers the finance report.

Mr. BRANCH. I can simplify this matter. I have offered an amendment, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOCKOCK] has offered an amendment to mine. The only essential respect in which his amendment differs from mine is, that mine directs the manner in which the printing shall be done, and his does not. If he will not withdraw his amendment, I will withdraw mine. It is useless to have votes upon both.

Mr. BOCKOCK. If I understood the matter as the gentleman from North Carolina does, I should have no difficulty in withdrawing my amendment. But, as I understand it, my amendment provides that the documents accompanying the President's message shall be printed and delivered, in advance of the delivery of the message here, into the hands of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives. Now, that is what I object to. I want the President authorized to have the documents printed, and keep the whole matter under his own control until the message is delivered to the House, and so stamped as a communication to the House, and then let it go forth to the country.

Mr. BRANCH. My amendment provides that so much of the documents accompanying the message as the President shall think proper to deliver in advance of the session shall be printed in the manner now prescribed by law for doing the congressional printing, and that the documents are now required to be distributed. The gentleman's amendment authorizes the President to have it done, not in the manner now prescribed by law, but in such manner as he shall select.

As the gentleman shows an indisposition to withdraw his amendment, and the matter is too small to consume the time of the House with, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I will accept the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands, then, that the gentleman from Virginia withdraws his amendment, and that the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina stands.

Mr. BOCKOCK. No, sir; as I understand it, the question now stands upon my amendment, as modified on the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. FLORENCE. In order that there may be no misapprehension, let the amendment be read. I think the two amendments may be taken together. The amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina does not include the message at all.

Mr. BRANCH. The President's message was purposely excluded.

Mr. FLORENCE. I so understood; but there seemed to be some misapprehension.

The amendment proposed by Mr. BOCKOCK, as modified by him at the suggestion of Messrs. BRANCH and VALLANDIGHAM, was then read, as follows:

Strike out section one, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the President of the United States be authorized to cause his annual message and accompanying documents, or, if he thinks best, the said documents alone, to be printed in the manner prescribed by law, in advance of the meeting of Congress; so that, upon the delivery of said message, it may, with the accompanying documents, be more speedily distributed among the members in the manner now prescribed by law. And that the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the report on the finances, made by him in pursuance of the act of May 10, 1890, to be printed to the manner prescribed by law, and copies thereof delivered to the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, in time for distribution at the commencement of each session, in the manner prescribed by law for the distribution of documents ordered to be printed by Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon conceding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FLORENCE. Will the gentleman from Ohio withdraw the demand for the previous question, to enable me to offer an amendment to provide that the documents shall be printed complete, as I suggested.

Mr. SHERMAN. I insist upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, I will look to the Senate.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the bill has not been engrossed.

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask if the bill, at this stage, is susceptible of amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was engrossed; and I hope that motion I demand the yeas and nays. I will state that my object is to give time to engross the bill. I suppose it will not require more than five minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I move that the House adjourn.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. ADRIN. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment. I rise to a question of privilege. The gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HAMILTON], in his remarks to-day, impugned the conduct of the Speaker in not giving him the floor. I wish to say, in justification of the Speaker, that I distinctly heard him recognize the gentleman from Texas, and assign him the floor; and I wondered at the time that the gentleman did not avail himself of the right awarded him.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman from New Jersey states, and I am told by others, that the Speaker refused to give me when I sought the floor. I was perfectly confident that the Speaker saw me as I rose, and that I rose before the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN]; but I was not aware that the floor was assigned to me. If I had heard the Speaker, I should not have made the remark which I did, and which I now withdraw.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. JENKINS. I rise to a question of privilege. I send to the Clerk's desk a paragraph which I never read.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. BURNETT. I did not insist on the motion when the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ADRIN] wished to explain, and of course I cannot insist on it now.

The Clerk read from a dispatch of the Associated Press, stating that Mr. JENKINS had addressed the House in favor of a protective tariff.

Mr. JENKINS. That dispatch appears as having been sent by the agent of the Associated Press. The error was made, I presume, in the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JENKINS]. I wish to say, that mistakes of that character have been very frequent. My name has been published in the papers of the country even in connection with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] as Speaker. I refer to the matter now simply for the purpose of calling attention to it, hoping that similar mistakes will not occur in future.

Mr. MORSE. I rise for the purpose of making a personal explanation. I was in my committee-room, attending to business of the committee of which I am a member, and was sent for to vote on the reference of the Army appropriation bill, when that was before the House. I came into the House, and was told that the question was on referring the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. I voted "no." My intention was to vote in such a manner as to keep that bill in charge of the Committee of Ways and Means. I wish to make this explanation now, because I voted to accomplish the same purpose in the last Congress, and because I expect to do so hereafter; and I do not wish this vote to be referred to as indicating any other purpose.

Mr. BURNETT. I now renew my motion that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at a quarter past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, March 9, 1890.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. GRELEY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating a report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, showing the progress of that work during the year ending November 1, 1889, with a map, prepared in obedience to an act approved March 3, 1853; which was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion of Mr. PEACE to print the report was referred to the Committee on Printing.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

An act (No. 44) confirming certain land entries under the third section of the act of 3d March, 1855, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1886," to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act (No. 63) to regulate the mileage of members of Congress—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTER. I present the petition of W. H. Vespy, United States consul at Havre, praying to have refunded to him money paid by him on account of the default of bankers in Paris, with whom he had deposited funds of the Government; and I move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. IVERSON. Before that petition is received, I wish to present a question to the Senate as to the power of gentlemen to present anything to-day, inasmuch as the whole day is assigned for the Private Calendar.

Seventeenth. We have the morning hour. Mr. IVERSON. I wish the Senate to decide whether morning business is to be taken up in preference to the Private Calendar, or whether that is not the first business in order immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senator will allow the petition which I have presented to go.

Mr. IVERSON. If I let that go, I may have to let a hundred go. I wish the question decided. I call for the execution of the order of the Senate, setting aside the Private Calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution under which the Senate is acting.

The Secretary read the following resolution, adopted on the 21st of February:

Resolved, That, for the residue of the present session, after the reading of the Journal, each day, the Senate be kept apart for the consideration of private bills, in the order in which they stand upon the Calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was disposed to regard it as in the nature of a special order, and to allow the morning hour to be occupied in the morning business; but he will submit the question to the Senate, if the Senator from Georgia desires it.

Mr. IVERSON. The reason why I object to it to-day is, that there is a matter set down for two o'clock, and I should the morning hour to be consumed with the reception of petitions and reports, there will be no time for the Private Calendar; because the question which is assigned for two o'clock will probably occupy the remainder of the day. The argument or excuse of Mr. Ives will be of no benefit. It will spring up a discussion, undoubtedly, and I do not suppose that matter will be got rid of during the remainder of the day. I desire, at least, to have some time appropriated to the Private Calendar to-day. Therefore, I make the question, and I hope the Senate will decide it. I will appeal from the decision of the Chair, as a matter of formality, so as to let the Senate decide the question whether the Private Calendar has precedence from the reading of the Journal, or whether the morning business is to be decided.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senate is clearly entitled to the morning hour.

Mr. IVERSON. I do not wish to appeal, but I desire to have the question presented to the Senate in some shape.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senate is clearly entitled to the morning hour, and the decision of the Chair is evidently correct; otherwise, every special order might take effect from the reading of the Journal, and shut out the current business of the Senate.

Mr. IVERSON. It will be remembered that whenever a special order is set down, the hour is designated; but this is a general order, made by the Senate, setting apart the whole of Friday for the consideration of private business.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate having by resolution set apart Friday for the consideration of the Private Calendar, the Senator from Georgia makes the question that it must be taken up immediately after the reading of the Journal. The impression of the Chair is, that it is in the nature of a private order, and to be called up at the hour when other special orders are called up, and hence that the morning hour, as heretofore, may be occupied in the presentation of petitions and reports. The Chair, however, will submit the question to the Senate—it is indifferent to him—that the Private Calendar on Friday stand in the position of a special order, or shall it be taken up the moment the reading of the Journal is concluded?

MR. PEARCE. I suggest that the ordinary form is to propound the question thus: Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair proposes to submit the question to the Senate.

MR. PEARCE. I understood the Senator from Georgia to take an appeal.

MR. IVERSON. I withdraw that.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Perhaps, after all, that is the simpler form. The Chair will decide that he will call for petitions and reports during the morning hour, and the Senator from Georgia will appear on a matter of form.

MR. IVERSON. Very well.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

The question being put, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The petition presented by the Senator from Virginia will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

MR. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of Mrs M. Alexander, praying to be allowed a pension on account of the military services of her father, George Madison, in the war of the Revolution, the Indian wars, and that of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions; and motion by him to print the petition was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MR. PEARCE presented a memorial of Thatcher Perkins and William McMahon, praying an extension of their patent for an improvement in the manufacture of locomotive engines; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

MR. BIGLER presented a memorial of merchants and citizens of Philadelphia, relative to life-saving stations on the coasts of Long Island and New Jersey; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Marine Underwriters, relative to life-saving stations on the coasts of Long Island and New Jersey; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MR. SEWARD presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, in relation to the life-saving stations on the coasts of Long Island and New Jersey; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MR. WIGFALL presented the memorial of Loomis L. Langdon, a lieutenant in the Army, praying remuneration for baggage carried off by the Mexicans under Cortina; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

MR. CAMERON presented eight petitions of manufacturers and others of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, praying such a modification of the tariff as will protect the industrial and productive interests of the country; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that pensions may be allowed to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, and the widows of those deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MR. BINGHAM presented the petition of Theron Hamilton, of Burlington, Michigan, praying Congress to have five thousand copies of the Declaration of Independence and Washington's Farewell Address printed together and distributed; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of MR. GRIMES, it was Ordered, That the letter of the Delegate of the Territory of Utah, in Congress, inclosing the memorial of delegates of the Utah assembly at Great Salt Lake City, and adopted a constitution with a view to the admission of Utah into the Union as a State, together with a copy of that constitution, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Territories.

On motion of MR. MASON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of C. E. Anderson, late secretary of the Treasury, praying to be allowed additional compensation during the time he acted as chargé d'affaires at that court, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of MR. MASON, it was Ordered, That Frederick A. Beebe have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of MR. NICHOLSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of James C. Jewett, praying that the Government of the United States will demand from the Government of Peru the tonnage he sustained in consequence of the failure of the Government of Peru to comply with the terms of the agreement between the two Governments in relation to the Lolo Islands, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of MR. IVERSON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of H. B. Schoolcraft, praying compensation for the collection of the facts and materials embodied in the history, statistics, condition, and improvement of the United States, be referred to the Committee and published by him, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

A. A. LOCKWOOD.

MR. HEMPHILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the papers in the case of A. A. Lockwood be returned to the Senate by the Court of Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

MR. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a memorial of the Boston Board of Trade, praying that a better description of life-boats, and other improved means for the preservation of vessels, may be required, and that they be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, praying the adoption of more efficient measures for the saving of life-boats, and other improved means for the preservation of vessels, and that they be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

MR. FITCH, from the Committee on Printing, reported a bill (S. No. 362) providing for a reduction in the prices allowed for the public printing, and providing for the binding of the public documents, reports, and Journals; which was read, and passed to a second reading, and ordered to lie on the table.

MR. DURKEE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Haym M. Salomon, praying indemnity for moneys advanced and losses sustained by his father, Haym Salomon, during the war of the Revolution, submitted a report thereon, and introduced a bill (S. No. 263) for the relief of Haym M. Salomon. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

MR. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 361) to authorize the levy court to issue warrants and other licenses in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MR. DURKEE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 364) to provide for the appointment of a judge for a district of country within the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

THE CAPITOL GROUNDS.

MR. BRIGHT, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 365) to enlarge the public grounds situated in the Capitol; which was read twice by its title.

MR. BRIGHT. Were it not, Mr. President, that there are already so many special orders, I should ask the Senate to make this bill a special order for some day not far distant; but I am unwilling to embarrass gentlemen who have special orders. I will state, however, that I shall take occasion at an early day to call up the bill, believing it is important that we should settle the question whether we will open the Capitol grounds or not. It is proper that I should state, further, that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, both of the Senate and House of Representatives, have had a meeting and unanimously agreed upon this bill. We have caused a map to be made showing the shape, size, and location of the ground we propose to take within the enclosure around the Capitol, and have caused the map to be placed in the Senate Chamber, with proper explanations upon it, and a mark drawn around the end which we propose to include. I hope Senators will, in their leisure moments, examine it with a view to being able to vote upon the question when it comes up. Let the bill go on the Calendar or lie on the table; I have no choice.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It will go on the Calendar, if no motion be made.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further petitions and reports, the Chair will commence calling the bills on the Calendar.

MR. CLAY. I submit a motion to postpone the Private Calendar until we dispose of the bill which has been the subject of debate for several days in succession, making appropriations for the West Point Academy, and the other bills we can now dispose of in a short time. I think there will be no further discussion on it. In my opinion, we had better try to do one thing at a time. We have a great deal of unfinished business before us. I submit the motion to the Senate.

The motion was not agreed to. There being, on a division—ayes fourteen, noes not counted.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message from the President of the United States, by MR. BREWSTER, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed, on the 8th instant, an act (S. No. 217) for the relief of William B. Herrick.

WIDOW OF GENERAL SMITH.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The first bill on the Private Calendar is the bill (S. No. 73) for the relief of Mrs. Anne M. Smith, widow of the late Brerret Major General Persifer F. Smith. That bill is now before the Committee of the Whole, the question being on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, [MR. IVERSON], as amended, to add to the bill:

And that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place the name of Mrs. Harriet B. Macomb, widow of General Alexander Macomb, deceased, late commanding general of the Army, on the roll of pensioners, and to pay her a pension, at the rate of fifty dollars per month, from the date of the approval of this act; and also, that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place the name of Mrs. Arabella Riley, widow of Brerret Major General Benoit Riley, deceased, late of the Army, on the roll of pensioners, and pay her a pension, at the rate of fifty dollars per month, from the date of the approval of this act.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

MR. HUNTER. Is there any report with that bill? If so, I should like to hear it.

MR. THOMSON. There is no report.

MR. IVERSON. There was done with the amendment in favor of Mrs. Macomb, which I offered the other day?

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It was rejected. The question now is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

MR. IVERSON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

MR. CAMERON. This is a bill allowing a pension to the widow of General Persifer Smith. There has been no report made by the committee, but if Senators require any information on the subject, the Secretary of the Interior, who investigated the case, will make a statement.

MR. THOMSON. Mr. President, this case was referred to the Committee on Pensions in 1858. It was supposed at that time that the case of General Persifer Smith was a well known fact that it was not necessary to make a special report, but I find among the papers, in my own handwriting, quite an elaborate brief of the case, made at the time; and for the information of the Senate I will read some of the papers, for the purpose of showing that General Smith's death was caused by disease contracted in the line of his duty—as much so as if he had been shot by a cannon ball on the field of battle.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator from New Jersey allow me to ask him what he means by disease contracted in the line of a man's duty? Every man who dies in the service dies from disease probably, and from disease contracted in the line of his duty, unless he is hung, or some casualty happens to him. I want to understand the meaning of the phrase "disease contracted in the line of duty."

Mr. THOMSON. The Committee on Pensions has never reported a bill in favor of any applicant, unless the death could be traced very distinctly to some disease contracted in the service—not as in the case of General Macomb, who died at a very advanced age, and of no disease whatever at the time. I find among these papers a certificate from Louis A. Edwards, a surgeon in the Army, which states what was the disease and how he contracted it. It is endorsed by Dr. Wood, who concurs in it, and also by Dr. Wright, an Army surgeon. Then there is a very important document, under oath, from Lieutenant Gibbs, of the rifles, a brevet captain, and he says that he was continuously in the society of General Smith from March, 1847.

Mr. HALE. With the consent of the Senator from New Jersey, I want to move in the Senate the amendment which was rejected in committee.

Mr. THOMSON. I give way for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. I do not know how it was with the other members of the Senate, but for myself, I was not aware that the amendment had been rejected in committee, and I now move in the Senate the amendment for Mrs. Macomb and Mrs. Riley.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that the question was upon the amendment in reference to Mrs. Macomb and the amendment to the amendment embracing Mrs. Riley. The Senator can arrive at what he desires by asking for a division of the amendment.

Mr. HALE. No, sir; I do not wish a division. The vote was taken when I was not attending to it; and some other Senators, I think, were in the same condition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the question now is on the amendment which the question is in the Committee of the Whole, which is now renewed.

Mr. IVERSON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Benjamin, Bigler, Bingham, Briggs, Cameron, Chandler, Claiborne, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Durkee, Fitch, Fols, Green, Hale, Hammond, Harlan, Humphreys, Iverson, Kennedy, Lane, Latham, Foster, Rice, Seward, Simmons, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Thomson, Wilson, and Wilson—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Briggs, Clay, Clingman, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Grimes, Hamlin, Harts, Johnson, Johnson, Mason, Nicholson, Powell, Sibley, Trumbull, and Yale—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. IVERSON. As I announced the other day my determination to vote against the bill, even with the amendments, although I voted for them in order to put all on the same footing, I now ask for the yeas and nays on the bill as amended, in order that the question may be settled in that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is: Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time? on which question the yeas and nays have already been ordered. The Senator from New Jersey was entitled to the floor. Does he desire to renew his remarks?

Mr. THOMSON. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. DAVIS. I was waiting for the Senator from New Jersey to explain the bill. The first case which is presented is that of General Smith, and I think it comes strictly within the law. I think he died of disease contracted in the line of his duty, and I think it is covered by the spirit of the law as fully, as any other pension case. It is known to most of those who hear me that General Smith, after his gallant service in Mexico, returned suffering from disease contracted in the result of the climate and his exposure to it. He was very much thereafter put on duty in Texas, where similar causes produced like results. When relieved from duty in Texas, his health to a great extent recovered, and he was offered the command of the expedition to Utah; and, with the high pride and energy of a soldier, which had characterized him through life, he started on that expedition. The only way he could possibly have been relieved of the duty would have been to expect him to die when he got upon the plains, where he must drink water impregnated with lead. He died sooner than they expected, struggling to perform a duty which was strictly professional. I think he is thus brought within the spirit of the law, and that there should be no objection to allowing his widow a pension.

In the case of General Macomb, it has been stated, and truly, that he died of advanced age; but the years of his life had been passed in the honorable service of his country. He was stationed at Washington in the later part of his life, because he was selected to command the whole Army of the United States, and this became his station. He had rendered brilliant service during the war of 1812, and rendered good service in every station he occupied. He died without a fortune; and his debts, as it appears by a letter read some days since in the Senate, were paid from the private property of his wife. She now appeals to you for a pension; and those who know General Macomb better than myself, will be represented to you that she needs it. I trust the Senate will grant it.

The other case is the case of the widow of General Riley. General Riley, after more fatiguing marches than were, perhaps, performed by any other officer of the Army during the Mexican war, returned to the United States in the same day of his country and of those who saw him in many scenes of danger. He was one of the few who took part on both sides of operations during the war. He was distinguished in several engagements which turned the scale of the campaign in the valley of Mexico. To him, all admit, is mainly due the capture of Contreras. He displayed there not only his skill, but his gallantry, in the most signal manner, defying a charge of cavalry by troops drawn up in line, and then, under a fog which covered the fort, taking it by a coup de main, being one of the first who entered the fort. On every occasion his patriotic and his military zeal was exhibited. After the close of the war he went to California. Trained from his youth as a soldier, with very little other knowledge than that which was necessary to military affairs, he was suddenly charged with civil functions; and the balls of the enemy, which had so often spared him, were exchanged for trials to which he was less equal. He returned from California prostrated. The trials of civil life had broken a constitution which had borne the fatigues of so many campaigns. He died, and left a family with nothing but the good name he had won by so many years of valuable service. His widow appeals to you for a pension. Shall she have it?

These cases are like others which have gone before; instances in which we are called upon to show the gratitude of the people for services rendered in their behalf; occasions when it is in the power of Congress to stimulate the youth to such deeds as their sires have done. They are cases like those of General and Worth, and equally, for the same reasons, their appeal to you for pensions ought now to be granted. I trust the Senate will not refuse them. I honor the spirit of economy manifested by the Senator from Georgia, who has voted for amendments upon a bill which had special claims, in order that he might thereafter defeat the whole together. I may wish, however, that that economy was exhibited in some other point. Let us take $1,800 from our own expenditures, rather than strip the needy widow of good soldiers of that pittance, when they ask it on their hands.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 36, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Benjamin, Bigler, Briggs, Cameron, Chandler, Claiborne, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Durkee, Fitch, Fols, Green, Hale, Hammond, Harlan, Humphreys, Kennedy, Lane, Latham, Nicholson, Powell, Rice, Seward, Simmons, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Thomson, Wilson, and Wilson—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Bingham, Briggs, Clay, Clingman, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Grimes, Hamlin, Harts, Johnson, Johnson, of Tennessee, Mason, and Trumbull—13.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. It was read the third time.

Mr. GRIMES. Is the bill still open to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. COLLAMER, the title of the bill was amended, so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Mrs. Anne M. Smith, widow of the late Brevet Major General Persifer F. Smith; and Mrs. Harriet B. Macomb, widow of Major General Alexander Macomb, deceased; and also Mrs. Arabella Riley, widow of Brevet Major Beuret Riley, deceased."

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I move that when the Senate adjourns, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DOLITTLE. At twelve o'clock, and every day thereafter at that hour.

Several Senators. At one o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) One o'clock is named. The longest time will be put first. The question is on the motion that when the Senate adjourns, it be to meet on Monday next, at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FOSTER, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 26) to extend the provisions of "An act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits" to Minnesota and Oregon, and other States, which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

The message further announced that the House had ordered, this day, the printing of the following documents:

Letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating the report of the United States Coast Survey—ordered at twelve o'clock and thirteen minutes.

Letter of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the House, a report of the progress of the wagon road from Fort Smith to the Colorado river—ordered at twelve o'clock and fifteen minutes.

Letter of the Secretary of War, communicating the report of the art commission—ordered at twelve o'clock and fifteen minutes.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour fixed by the Senate has arrived within a few seconds for the answer of Mr. Hyatt to the questions proposed to him by the order of the Senate.

Mr. MASON. I move that the witness be brought into the Chamber, in pursuance of the order of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will fulfill the order.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in his custody Mr. Hyatt.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. Hyatt, are you prepared now to answer the questions which I asked you by order of the Senate?

Mr. HYATT. Yes, sir. I have my answer here. I am unable to read it. I hope the Clerk will read it for me.

Mr. MASON. I propose that the document which the witness tenders be received at the desk of the Secretary, and examined, to see if it contains answers to the interrogatories put to him, and whether they are under oath.

The motion was agreed to; and the Sergeant-at-Arms took the answer to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary is informing the Chair that it purports to be an answer to two interrogatories, and that it is under oath.

Mr. MASON. I observe, by a cursory look at the document, that it is a very long one. A great deal, or a portion of it at least, is apparently printed matter. I do not know how we can ascertain even the substance without reading it, or at least so much of it as to see its character, so that we can determine whether to receive it, or to refer its consideration to the committee or not. I propose, therefore, that it be read for the present, in order to see if it contains any material, the reading can be stopped at any particular point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Secretary will proceed with the reading of the answer.

Mr. MASON. The witness may take a seat. The Sergeant-at-Arms conducted him to a seat behind the bar.

The Secretary proceeded to read the answer, as follows:

At the honorable Senate of the United States:
The undersigned, Thaddeus Hyatt, of the city of New York, by your resolution, adopted March 6, 1860, received, under oath, to answer the following questions:
1. When you excuse have you not assumed the office of committee of the Senate, in pursuance of the summons served on you on the 9th day of January, 1860?
2. Will you be ready to appear before the committee, and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said committee?
3. In response to the first question, the undersigned would respectfully observe, that while admitting the justice and propriety of investigating committees, named by legitimate purposes, he is constrained to regard such a committee as one raised upon the resolution of the 24th of December, 1859, to investigate the Harper's Ferry matters, as a tribunal with powers such as were never before known or contemplated in this Republica Government; powers that are inconsistent with freedom, subversive of liberty, and in violation of the fundamental law of the United States; and to be resisted, because,

First. Contrary to reason.
Second. Contrary to the Constitution; contrary to both, because it reveals the legislative branch of the American Government in the attitude of invading the rights of the citizen, and by coercive processes compelling citizens to produce matter for legislation; a function that is clearly and solely by the Constitution, and that cannot be the subject of things be thrust upon him against his will. Contrary to both, because the mode of inquiry in obliging witnesses to answer their questions is not that of a judicial proceeding, but of a "unreasonable seizure," in the sense of the fourth article of the Amendments to the Constitution, inasmuch as testimony may be "coerced" as well as by the exercise of the jurisdiction of the United States as another. In the argument his learned counsel, which he herewith introduces as a portion of his answer.

Mr. MASON. It is very apparent that the paper purporting to be an answer to the first question—that is, what excuse he has to offer—is an argument, I suppose, tending to show that he is not bound to answer. In order to save the time of the Senate, I propose that the Secretary be directed to read the answer to the second question. The second question is, whether he is now ready to answer, after having given his excuse. If he is now ready to answer, I shall then proceed to read the answer to the first question, and let him proceed to answer. If he declares that he is not ready to answer the questions of the committee, then we can take further action.

Mr. SUMNER. If I understand the two questions propounded by the Senator to the witness, one is, whether he is ready to answer, and the second is, whether he is willing to answer. If I understand the Senator from Virginia aright, he proposes to arrest the answer of the witness to the first question, to pass that over as unnecessary, and proceed at once to the answer to the second question. Now I must submit that that is unfair to the witness. The witness is here responding to the order of the Senate; he is before you to answer two specific questions; and it is now proposed to stop him midway in the answer to the first question without hearing what he has to say. I would say, sir, that that is so unjust that the Senate will not agree to it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yesterday the answer which is now put in was placed on our desks; but it is not an answer to the questions put. It is a denial of the jurisdiction of the Senate to cause him to appear. Now, sir, this witness is here, after the Senate of the United States have solemnly decided that they have the right to call him here. He appears, because he is bound to appear under oath, and to answer an excuse. He offers no excuse. He simply denies the jurisdiction and the power of the Senate of the United States to summon him here; and he enters into an argument to show that this body has usurped powers which do not belong to it, and is disrespectful to the Senate of the United States? I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts that there is not one word in that whole answer, as printed and laid upon our tables, which acknowledges the jurisdiction of the Senate of the United States. It is a total denial of the power to summon him here, and to cause him to appear. The Senator from Massachusetts will say that, in any part of that answer to the interrogatories propounded, it is stated that he is willing now to be examined before this committee. I will be perfectly willing to hear what he has to say in that long written argument—not an answer, but an argument. But there is nothing contained in it which now shows that he is willing to answer the interrogatories propounded to him under the order of the Senate. It is a denial of your jurisdiction; and I agree with the Senator from Virginia that we ought not to hear it.

Mr. FITCH. The answer is what in advance I expected, as a member of the committee, it would be long and what purporting to be legal argument, which is only adding to the contempt heretofore evinced on the part of the witness for the Senate. He was asked to state his reasons for having before declined to appear before the committee. Instead of contenting himself with merely so doing, he appears to have entered into a lengthy argument, in advance of his reasons, and closes by a summary of his reasons, which latter were all the Senate and all the committee desired. That summary, brief in itself, is all which properly ought to be read to the Senate. In answer to the second interrogatory, he says that he is now ready, and has been at all times, to voluntarily appear before the committee. I leave that answer to be compared with facts known to the committee; but that answer is all we really need to know. I presume that the Senator from Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Delaware made an appeal to me, and asked me if I could assure the Senate as to the contents of that document. Most assuredly I cannot. It is precisely because I cannot, and because I do not care here, that I think I ought to be read at the desk, and how the Senator from Delaware can undertake to anticipate what is in that document, I do not understand. It is there under oath, in response to your order; and without knowing what it contains, you propose to stop its reading—that is all.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not presume to stultify myself; and I presume no Senator means to stultify himself; but, sir, from hearing the answer of the witness read, it is apparent to every member of the Senate that the answer which was laid on our tables yesterday. The Senator from Massachusetts cannot deny that he believes the very answer in manuscript offered at your table is the printed answer which was read to the Senate yesterday. The words of the language, everything, indicates it to be the same. Now, sir, I say, in that printed paper which was placed upon our tables, and which reads, verbatim et literatim, precisely as this manuscript reads, there is no acknowledgment of the jurisdiction of the Senate of the United States. There is a total denial of the jurisdiction of this body, and a refusal to answer and place himself upon the justice of the country. It is an appeal to the great jury of the country for your jurisdiction, which the Senate has solemnly affirmed. I say, it is unbefitting of the Senate of the United States to allow a witness, when he is called upon to say what is his excuse, to question your jurisdiction, to deny your authority, to refuse to answer, throw defiance in your teeth, and set the Senate of the United States at defiance. That is the reason that I interposed an objection.

Mr. HALE. I do not mean to take up the time of the Senate unnecessarily. I suppose it is pretty clear what will be done. But I wish to make a suggestion as to a matter of fact. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts said that the witness did not, probably, a Senator on this floor that knows what is in that answer.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Delaware thinks so. Now, sir, I am willing to say, for I have no concealment about this matter, that I do know what the answer is. A friend of the—do not know whether to call him prisoner or witness, but a friend of that individual there, [laughter]—called upon me this morning with his argument, which that gentleman, the Senator from Delaware thinks, is not that printed argument which was laid on our desks. It embodies that in it. I told the friend of the individual then, that I thought, in arguing his case, his counsel had yielded altogether too much. The argument of that individual, in certain cases, the Senate may exercise this power. I think not, in any case; but I want to go further, and say, as a general fact—and then I will sit down and leave it to this body is generally composed of men who call these lives lawyers, and are reputed lawyers, and I have no doubt are very good lawyers—having all the virtues and a few of the vices incident to that profession.

Well, now, sir, in practice in courts, and I have attended some, it is generally the case, before a prisoner is sentenced, that the court ask him if he has anything to say why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon him. I know that question is not put on the idea that he can say anything which will prevent the sentence; for sentence is generally written and in the judge's pocket, or the clerk's hand, ready to be pronounced, before the speech is made. But, sir, I put it to you, that, is a court of justice—for a great many States seem to think we are a court, and if we could get that out of our heads, we should do a great deal better; we are no court, and are no part of a court, and bear no semblance to a court—but, in a court, when you put a question to a witness or a prisoner, it implies that while you have the right to question, he has the right to answer, and, provided his answer is not disrespectful and insulting, you are bound to hear it. I do not mean to say that this is the law. I cannot turn to any part of the Constitution and read there that every person who is so brought up shall have the privilege of answering questions. I think you put the question propounds that he has a right to answer, if he answers respectfully. Now, sir, if he answers as becomes an American citizen, denying your right, I appeal to the candor of the Senator from New Hampshire, if he is disrespectful to the Senate, I should be very anxious to do a thing, to say a word, or to omit to do a thing, or to omit to say a word, from either of which anything disrespectful to this body, on my part, might be imputed to me.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator from New Hampshire excuse me for a moment?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to propound a question for his candid answer. Is there anything contained in the manuscript answer that is not contained in the printed answer which was laid on our tables yesterday? I ask him whether he knows that fact or not?

Mr. HALE. I should say, from a moderate calculation, there are at least twenty pages, and I should think, three pages; but I have that settled right in the arithmetic, if necessary.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will excuse me a moment, then I will say this: from the similarity of the reading of this answer with that put on our tables yesterday, I supposed it was the same. I have not now the printed answer of the Senator from New Hampshire. Does the witness acknowledge the jurisdiction of the Senate of the United States? Does he agree to answer any question? The Senator knows, I presume. If it is an argument against our jurisdiction, my point applies.

Mr. HALE. The Senator said he wanted to ask one question. He has asked two, and I shall answer both. He asks, does the individual admit the jurisdiction of the Senate? He does not. I should be very anxious to know whether he has up here to say a word in his behalf; you might do as you pleased to him, if he did admit it. He denies it entirely; but he denies it respectfully. That is his conviction as an American citizen. It is my conviction. I have no doubt upon the subject; and I have no doubt that he will be long before the Senator from Delaware, and every man who examines these questions of constitutional right and power, will come to that opinion. Sir, it would be libelous to express an opinion that the Senate, if they had committed an erroneous opinion, would not retract; and I think it would be libelous on the character of the Senate to undertake to say that they would not listen to a respectful argument from a citizen of the country in their custody, to show that it was under a misapprehension that they had put him in custody. I think this is consistent with the highest and profoundest respect for the Senate.

But, sir, he adds, at the end of the paper which he submitted, and which is something very different from the argument referred to, that, as a matter of voluntary right, he will be long before the Senate to answer, and always has been; but he denies your right to bring him here in the manner you have done. I deny it; but I should be as sorry as any man could be to say anything disrespectful to the Senate. I would not have my name here to day, and never look on this Chamber again, than bo guilty of any wanton disrespect to the Senate, or to any member of it, or to any of its privileges, its powers, or its functions. No man entertains a higher opinion of them than I do; and it is because I entertain these opinions, and because I wish to see them entertained by the whole community, that I desire the Senate to be very careful how they exercise even a doubtful power. Now, I think I have answered the Senator from Delaware fairly. The individual does deny your jurisdiction distinctly, and, I think, places himself on high grounds that cannot be met; and I think if any of the lawyers of this body will read the argument submitted by Mr. Sewall and Mr. Andrew—

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will he answer? The question is as to the second interrogatory. Is he ready to answer now?

Mr. HALE. I cannot tell that. He was an hour or two ago, when his friend called on me, [laughter], and I presume he is yet. But let me go on. I shall be very short. The Senator from Virginia, however, intimates to me that he would rather hear that paper than my speech. [Laughter.] Very well.

Mr. MASON. When I suggested that we should arrest the reading of the paper, and look to see what answer was given to the second question, it was from no purpose in the world to suppress this paper, if it is a respectful one. I had no knowledge of its character; but I had seen, I fear, a long paper, and, as I read, a great deal of it was an argument. My idea was simply this: there were two questions put to him. The first was, "What excuse have you for not obeying the summons of the committee?" And the second was, "Are you now ready to answer?" The first part of the paper was setting up his excuse, I presume; but it is a very long excuse, and I suppose an argumentative one. What its character is, I am utterly uninformed; but the suggestion I made was this—to do no injustice to the witness or anybody else; look to the response to the second interrogatory, and if he now agrees to answer the questions of the committee, release him from custody and bring him before the committee, and let him excuse go to the world for what it is worth. We have nothing to do with his excuse, if he is going to answer the questions. If he says he will not answer the questions, then I propose to do one of two things: to save the power of the Senate, and leave the witness in custody, and refer the paper to the committee, or let it be read in the Senate. I have very much to say in support of the Senate, as well as elsewhere, that in the attempt to save time we fail in it, and consume a great deal more. I ask that the answer to the second question may be read; and after that, if the Senate shall desire to hear the answer to the first question, I have no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think that we had better dispose of the matter in the easiest and simplest way. It seems to be a very long document. The idea of sitting here to hear it read, it seems to me, will not be very judicious, or, at least, I do not think it advantageous to any one; and I think the better course would be to refer the paper to the committee, and remand the witness into the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms until they have had time to examine it, and see whether it is an answer or not. I do not wish to sit here for an hour or two, and hear a very long argument read. We cannot well dispose of it, it seems to me, while we are in session here. I make the motion to refer the paper to the committee, and remand the witness to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms until they shall have had an opportunity to examine it, and see what further action is necessary. It seems to me that that would be the better course.

Several Senators. Print it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No; I do not want it printed, and I will not have it printed. I must say that, for one, I do not think it is very respectful to the Senate to come in here with an argument covering three or four quires of paper, in answer to a question as to what excuse he has for not appearing before a committee of this body. I do not think that any one would listen to it. I know my friend from New Hampshire says that this is not to be compared to a court; but I apprehend there is not a court in America which, when it had sent out its process against an individual for contempt, would listen to an argument of three or four hours from the witness, disputing its authority to send out its process. They would hear a statement of any matter of fact going to excuse the witness. But, sir, I do not wish to take up time. My object is to get rid of this thing with as little parade as possible; and I think the easiest way to get rid of it is to refer it to the committee, and let them determine whether it is going to be taken out of the court.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Illinois on this point. Whilst I concur with him in nearly everything he has said, there is a difficulty which he seems to overlook, that referring the paper to the committee would be in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. If he states in this paper that he is ready to answer the questions of the committee, I think it is but right he should be discharged; and that, the Senate alone can do.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senators indulge me a moment? If they will read the answer to the second question, they will find that the witness does not propose to answer.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, I think it will do no great harm for the witness, who has been put in custody here, that it will be read or two to read, to remain in custody until there is time to examine it. I think he would have no right to complain.

Mr. KING. The object stated by most of the Senators who spoken seems to be to save time. While I have no disposition that any more time shall be occupied with this matter than is necessary, I think there is something of principle involved in the question of whether the respondent has the right to have his answer read. I will state the Senate that he desires to have it read as the answer to the interrogatories that were propounded to him. While my opinion is clear, without doubt, as to the authority of the Senate, I still think that the respondent has the right to present his answer; and for this reason, without any question as to who shall be the first of having that answer read, and having the answers to the two interrogatories read in the order in which they are placed. In my opinion, that is the easiest and shortest mode for the Senate to proceed in this matter, and I think I should announce finally upon it. If this subject goes to a committee, it must come back to the Senate; and the question will then be, after it has been brought from the committee, precisely what it is now; and the Senate must hear that paper, in order to be able to state the case to the court. I hope that the paper will be read straight on, without reference to what may be contained in it.

Mr. MASON. I think we shall save time by reading the paper. It will take an hour or two.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. I did not hear his motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is to refer the paper to the select committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Unless my friend from Illinois will consent to my reading it, I feel that I must enter my protest to the doctrine which he has laid down. This man is brought before the Senate to answer for contempt, and the honorable Senator from Illinois seems to agree with the idea advanced on the other side of the House, that in order to get rid of him, we are to undertake to defend himself. Why, sir, what is the shape in which these questions are put? Rather out of order, I think. The first question should have been whether he was willing to answer. If he said no, his reasons should have been demanded of him; he would not answer; but they are placed in a different position.

Now he comes in here, and taking the questions precisely in the order in which they are put to him; he undertakes to give his reasons. The objection is made that it is a case to the jurisdiction; that is to say, he denies that we have any authority to bring him before us or to put questions to him; and my friend, the Senator from Illinois, seems to sustain the idea of the Senator from Delaware. Why, sir, it is a very bad notion to me that any one should be so contempt to plead to the jurisdiction, and I have yet to learn that any court so considers it.

My friend speaks of it as an induction upon us, that this man should have undertaken to argue his own case in writing and under oath, on account of the length of his argument; and he proposes to refer it to the committee to inquire. Why, sir, the committee is not the judge. The committee was reported the fact to the Senate, that the man did not appear and answer. The Senate ordered him to be brought—not before the committee, but before the Senate—to give the reasons why he did not answer the committee, the organ of the Senate. Now, if the committee has a right to answer to that body which he has offended—for I take it the committee is not the dignified court that has the right to arrest men and bring them here, from different sections of the country, to the Senate—when he comes before us to argue his own case, as every man has a right to do, under any circumstances, who is arraigned and whom it is proposed to punish, the answer is—from both sides of the House it would seem—that it is a gross contempt of the court—if you choose to regard the Senate as a court—to take up its time in telling the reasons why he is not willing to answer; and my friend observes that there is no court in the world that would submit to it. I apprehend that if my friend was on the bench, which he once dignified and adorned, and a man was brought before him under the same circumstances, he would say, "Sir, before I adjudge upon your case, I am ready to hear all you have to say, not only with regard to the thing itself, but with regard to my power to bring you before me." If he did not, he would deny him justice.

Now, if the committee has the word of this answer has been published and laid on our tables, it is not known that we have all read it.

Mr. MASON. I never saw it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Virginia never saw it.

Mr. MASON. I never saw it, except on the outside of the paper. I did not see it on my table.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have seen it and read it; but, from the very nature of the case, I was obliged to read it hastily. This man, who is now before the Senate, has a right to consider him innocent in present—undertakes to say in writing, if he has taken the course he has, and in respectful terms. Shall not his defense be read, no matter how much time it may take? It is not unfrequently the case that men appear by counsel, and defend themselves, and the counsel on the subject, in defense, where a man cannot answer properly for himself. Such a proceeding as is now suggested here would overturn the very first principles of law and justice everywhere, to undertake to say that he shall not be heard, and fully, too, especially when he is brought before the court, and is writing and under oath, and as well to our jurisdiction as to any other question that can be brought before the Senate. I am very glad that the Senator from Virginia appears to perceive the entire propriety of the thing, and to understand that we, as a body, judging in our own case, claiming to have been offended, should at least hear before we strike, and hear all that the man is disposed to say.

With regard to myself, I have gone along with the course that the Senate has pursued in this proceeding from the beginning. I took it for granted that we had the jurisdiction, that we had the right to enforce obedience to our summons; but, sir, I will say, that since I have read that argument, and more particularly since I have thought and reflected more than I have done on the subject, I tell Senators that there is doubt, and in this particular case a very serious doubt, whether we are not exercising a jurisdiction that we have no right to exercise; and it is as well for us to hear. Senators must know that in every question with regard to the power of Congress, or of either branch, in such cases, is a question that has been mooted heretofore in this country, and it is a question upon which the greatest minds in this country, that have gone before us, have been divided. The question is, whether the Senate, in such cases, always maintained in cases of a particular description; but I have been unable to find a precedent in this country, in Congress, where, in a case of this kind, (where we make the case and then summon the witness, and where it has not been made for us and forced upon us,) just as it has been claimed here has been exercised. I do not say it does not exist. The inclination of my mind is still that it may be defended, that it may be sustained; but I tell Senators that everything that can be said on that subject is worth hearing, especially in a question involving the liberty of one of our follow-citizens. We are a great body, to be sure, sir; but we are not greater than the people that make up, and the liberty of those that sent us here is not to be trifled with, particularly from considerations of our own personal dignity. At any rate, we are bound to give men all the time they reasonably require to make their defense, before we judge them.

MR. MASON. I was not aware that the Senator from Illinois had proposed to refer this paper; but I would submit to him, very respectfully, that if the Senate were to refer it, the only effect would be to have us go over again the same thing on the report of the committee. If the committee should report the answers sufficient, there would be a debate on it; if they should report them insufficient, there would be a debate on it and the Senate must know what the answers are, to determine. I submit to the honorable Senator, to save time, and to attain the same end, that he withdraw his proposition to refer, and let the paper be read. After it is read, then the question will be, what shall we do with it?

MR. TRUMBULL. I am not willing, sir, to be placed in a false position, or that a false issue should be made here in regard to the witnesses which I have made. This seizure, which is manifested in defense of the citizen and of liberty in all very well, and I like to see it on a proper occasion. But what is the motion? The motion is, to refer a voluminous paper to the committee having charge of the matter, and to the witnesses which I have made. I see what course to pursue in regard to the matter for the future, or what the next step ought to be; and this is magnified into a case of a man not being defended. Is anybody proposing to take from a citizen his liberty? He is in custody now.

MR. FESSENDEN. I do not understand that my friend desires any such thing. I only say such is the effect. I hope he will not understand me as imputing any wish of that kind to him.

MR. TRUMBULL. Well, Mr. President, I take it that it is depriving him of his liberty no more than he has been deprived of it the last two days. My friend from Maine admits that he voted to put this witness in custody and deprive him of his liberty. He has already been enjoying of which he is complaining. It is not the intention of anybody to condemn a citizen without a hearing. That is not the purpose.

Nor do I think that the remark I made in regard to the proceedings of a court is obnoxious to any objection which was made to it. I take it, if a person was summoned before a court on an attachment for a refusal to obey the process of a court, the court would hear from the witness any excuse he might have to offer for not having obeyed the summons of the court; but I apprehend if, in making that excuse, he were to file forty volumes of law books and reports of cases decided, as an answer, the court would not receive that as an excuse. I suppose that the excuse he is to make relates to matters of fact. If we have no authority to issue this process, that is one question.

MR. FESSENDEN. May not his excuse consist of matter of law, as well as matter of fact—matter to the jurisdiction, as well as any other matter?

MR. TRUMBULL. I suppose that his excuse must consist of a matter of law. I suppose there might be such a case, and he might object to the jurisdiction to summon him as a witness. He has a right to make that objection, doubtless; but I do not think it is compulsory on the Senate to listen to an argument from him on that subject. We certainly should listen to an argument of the honorable Senator from Maine in regard to it. This is a matter to be settled by the Senate. He may make his argument; but I think it is a very curious thing to allow an argument to be made by a private body to make arguments in regard to their cases, even upon questions about which there is no dispute as to the jurisdiction. On the passage of clama, or anything of the kind, we act on the rights of parties, but we do not necessarily hear arguments here in argument. We are here to give do. So the business of legislative bodies will generally not admit of the delay which would follow from such a course of proceeding.

But, sir, my object was simply, as I remarked before, to get rid of this matter with the least ceremony and the least parade, and I think that will be accomplished by referring the paper to the committee which has charge of the subject. Let them take it and examine it. If the answers are such as to require no further action of the Senate, except to discharge the witness, it will be very readily disposed of. If the answers are such as to require further action, the committee, after looking over the answers, will be prepared to suggest some course of action. That was my object in making the motion. I still think it would be the speediest way to get rid of the whole subject. The chairman of the select committee, I observe, objects to the reference, and prefers that we should let the answers be read to the Senate in this document. If it be read, I apprehend it will be very difficult for any Senator to understand so long a document from the mere reading of it, so as to be prepared to act on it at once.

MR. MASON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? I have looked at the paper, and at its commencement it proposes to be an answer to the first question, and then it introduces an argument of counsel, so declared to be in the answer. Now, I should propose to strike that out, and let the body of the answer be read for the benefit of the argument of counsel, let him submit it in the proper form before the Senate; but to put the argument of counsel into his response to a question which he has to answer—what were his reasons for not appearing—would seem to me not to be respectful to the body which the question is addressed. So much as is in print is declared in the paper to be the argument of counsel. I shall propose, not to strike it out, but to omit it in the reading, and to read that which is really an answer to the question. If he wants to be heard by counsel, let him submit it in writing, or in print; and, therefore, the Secretary will go on and read the paper, omitting the printed argument.

MR. TRUMBULL. I will not insist on my motion to refer it to the committee, against the wishes of the chairman of the committee; but I do maintain that when the Senator from Virginia makes his motion to omit reading a part of it, somebody will call for it, and we shall have the same thing. I really think the motion I have made would get rid of it in the speediest way, and with the least ceremony. That is what I desire.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois withdraw his motion?

MR. TRUMBULL. I will, if the Senator from Virginia desires it. I will not press it.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. When the question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

MR. BENJAMIN. It really seems to me we are giving this matter a great deal more consideration than it deserves, or than is at all consistent with the dignity of the Senate. An individual is asked here to answer two questions. His answer is too long to be read conveniently. Why not pursue the course suggested by the Senator from Illinois—refer it to the committee to look at it, commit him again, and let the committee tell us what his answer is? I hope to hear of it having not time to read them in open Senate? If the witness undertook to quote twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, one hundred decisions at length, should we be bound to read them? If he chooses to incorporate long printed arguments of counsel, are we bound to hear them? I hope to hear of there is no such constitutional obligation on me. I do not want to read them. We have committees here to do that part of the duty of the Senate which it is not convenient for us to do in mass. If I understand, from what the gentleman has just said, superintending this matter. This man comes here with a volume as an answer to a question of fact. We have not time to sift out his answer out of his argument. Let the committee do it, and let us know on Monday what his answer is.

If I understand, from what the gentleman has just said, the answer is simply this: "my excuse for not answering is, that I do not think that you have the power to make me answer; and based on that is my second response, that I do not intend to answer." It may be that this is not really the answer, but it is here to pick out a grain of wheat from the mountain of chaff. Let us refer the matter to the committee, and let the committee tell us what his answers really are. We cannot go on here as in a court of justice, examining into legal arguments, before we know what is really before us. In a court of justice an argumentative plea would not be allowed.

MR. GRIMES. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question? Suppose this committee should report that Mr. Hyatt had been guilty of contempt, and that he ought to be punished for that contempt; would the Senator from Louisiana vote, or would he expect that any other Senator would vote, in favor of that report, without a thorough investigation of the whole of that answer?

MR. BENJAMIN. Not at all; and I am proposing nothing that looks that way. I am proposing simply this: that the committee should read the answers, and let the Senate decide what it is, instead of having it read here at length.

MR. GRIMES. Then the question will come up again as it is now. Suppose it should turn out, on an investigation of the answer, as has been stated by the Senator from Virginia, that Mr. Hyatt has declined to answer the questions that may be propounded to him; the committee would then probably report that he should be punished for a contempt of the Senate; and we should have to pass upon that. We will not now be expected to pass upon that. We will adopt the report of the committee without a thorough sifting of all the testimony that tends to convict him of the contempt.

MR. BENJAMIN. The Senator is running ahead quite too fast. I do not propose anything which could give rise to the question which he suggests. I do not propose to refer it to the committee, for them to report to us whether this person is to be punished or not. I propose that somebody, whose business it is to attend to this matter, read the answers, and report to the Senate what the answers are. When that is done, then we shall determine what further steps we shall take. I do not wish the entire Senate to be at the mercy of any individual who is brought up here on a question of contempt, on the demand of anybody, to have an answer which he chooses, if the person brought to the bar chooses to answer to read it. When we know what the answers are—that is to say, when our committee shall tell us that the excuse offered is that there is no jurisdiction; and that, to the second question, the witness says he has no answer, and that the questions—when that is brought before us, and we know that those are the answers, then the committee may make some proposition on the subject. If the committee think we have jurisdiction, the question will arise, whether we will allow that point to be urged. The witness offers his answer, now undertakes to argue that point. We may determine that we have already decided it, and will hear no argument on it, or we may determine that we will hear his argument. We may determine that we will hear it argued by himself, or counsel, as we please; but we cannot be compelled to sit here and listen to anything that a witness chooses to say, when a question is asked him. We want an answer to the question, not an argument; and if he chooses to make an argument when he has no answer, we will hear it, and he will be compelled to listen to it. We asked that it be put in writing for that very purpose, that our time be not taken up with an argument for an answer. Let the paper go to the committee, and then they will report, and see what is to be done. I repeat the motion to refer it to the committee.

MR. FESSENDEN. I am really so obtuse that I cannot understand the honorable Senator's argument. If there is anything in it, I cannot see it. The Senator from Louisiana objects to an argument by way of reading. He objects to a categorical answer. Well now, sir, is that the way we treat a man when he is brought to the bar under such circumstances? I say he has a right to make an argument, and you have no right to close your ears to it. His excuse is argument, or his argument is excuse, just what you would please to put it. If you ask a man to give you an excuse for doing or not doing a thing—

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Maine pause for a moment?

MR. FESSENDEN. I will with pleasure, for I cannot hear my own voice.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. There is so much confusion on the right and left that the voice of the Senator on the floor is inaudible.

MR. FESSENDEN. You ask a man to give an excuse, and you undertake to say that that shall not be argumentative. In its very nature it is argumentative. The question put to him is: "What excuse have you?" Now, according to the ideas of Senators, it can be said: "I think you have no jurisdiction;" but is not it liable to go on and tell you why. Is he to take for granted that you know everything that he has to say that he cannot imagine anything that you have not in possession of? Is he to take for granted as high an opinion of the intelligence of this body as any one, and yet, upon my soul, I think it is not quite infallible. Sometimes we make mistakes, and sometimes we find that other men know more than we do, on some subjects at any rate; and yet the idea that it properly and simply is when this man comes to answer that question we ask him, to give his excuse, all he is to say is: "I deny your authority." He may say that if he please; and then it is to be referred to a committee to find out whether they are of the same opinion, and then they are to come to us. That is a curious mode of proceeding. I take it, it makes no difference to the gentleman who is accused here—for I understand he is a gentleman, and I shall treat him as such, although he is not bright to me—and I understand that he entertains the opinion—and counsel, eminent and learned, whom I know personally, and for whom I have the greatest respect, for their opinions as lawyers as well as for their characters, say that, in their judgment, he is right, and they believe he is right. I know enough to believe that opinion on the subject, apart from their position as counsel.

Are we not to hear what they have to say? Are we to refer this matter to a committee? Sir, we cannot get rid of the responsibility. We are judges ourselves; he is brought to our bar; it is before us that he appears; and now, as a mere matter of time, if he is willing to remain in custody, it makes no difference to me whether we hear him to-day, or on Monday, or Tuesday. We ought to hear him as speedily as possible; as speedily as we desire to be heard by the committee of writing, and shows that he designs to manifest any contempt for us, that is one thing; but if he presents a written argument—much shorter, I will venture to say, than hundreds that have been made by the honorable Senator from Arkansas, and that I have heard by myself and by my honorable friend from Illinois—I do not see that he is guilty of any great disrespect, when this matter involves his own personal liberty and a question of his own punishment.

I see no propriety in sending this to a committee at all. If it were sent to the committee, there might be a propriety in printing the document, so that we might consider it, and have it before us; and then, I presume, there would be no application to have it read here in public; if there was a desire to save time, but when we undertake to bring a man before us for an offense against us, and to try him, with reference to punishing him, I apprehend it does not lie in our mouths to say that we have not time to hear what he has to say on the subject, although it does interrupt the course of our ordinary business.

Mr. FOSTER. I always feel discouraged, Mr. President, when an attempt is made in this body to show how we may economize time. It always takes longer to demonstrate the manner than it does to go through with the thing that is objected to, on account of its taking up time. My only object in rising was to ask if it be not the right and privilege of every member of this body, when a paper is introduced here, and he is asked to vote upon it, to hear it read before he can be called upon to vote? I would ask myself, if the Chair should say it is not a rule of the body, or a parliamentary rule, that before we can be called upon to vote on a paper here, we are entitled to hear it read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Every resolution upon which the Senate must act must be read, if required, and every question must be read, as stated upon which a Senator is compelled to vote.

Mr. FOSTER. The motion now is to refer this paper to a committee. In order to know how to vote, in order to vote understandingly, I must know what the paper is, and I ask that the paper be read; and I ask, if the gentleman has a right to hear it read before I can be called upon to vote, either upon its sufficiency or insufficiency, or to vote upon its reference.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Maine are lawyers, eminent in their profession. Now, let us look at this question in the light of the facts. Mr. Hyatt was summoned to appear before a committee appointed by the Senate of the United States to investigate certain matters. What was his duty as a good citizen? Prima facie his duty was to appear and answer the questions. He did not appear. His non-appearance was reported to the Senate by the committee. A resolution was then passed to compel his appearance by the highest power known to this body. Upon that question a test vote was taken. The Senate of the United States decided, not unanimously, but by a very large majority, that they had jurisdiction, had the right to call him a witness, had the right to compel his appearance. They sent their Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to bring this man before the body. He is brought here. He is asked, in the very language which is put to a witness under such circumstances in a court of justice, what excuse he has for not appearing. How is it proposed to answer that question? I submit now, both to the Senator from Connecticut and to the Senator from Maine, as lawyers, if they, sitting as judges in a court, had issued a summons requiring the attendance of a witness, and he failed to appear, and then, as judges, they had ordered an attachment against that witness, and he was brought before them under it, would they listen to an argument showing that they were unworthy of power, showing that they were exercising power which they had no right to exercise, that in language disrespectful to them as a court? Would they hear such a witness?

Mr. FOSTER. Does the Senator wish an answer to the question? So far as I am concerned, if the Senator will allow me, I will answer very briefly the question that he put.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. I would say that if I were sitting as a court under such circumstances, and the witness was brought in on an attachment, and if such circumstances occurred as he has just mentioned, and answering as a witness on the summons, I would hear his answer. If he proposed to answer under oath, and that answer contained an argument, I would hear that just as readily as anything else; and I should suppose I was not doing more than to hear a just answer.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then, Mr. President, all I have to say is, that the Senator from Connecticut would make a most amiable judge. I have been practicing law for some fifteen years, and I have never seen a witness appearing in a court-house when the question was asked, what excuse have you for not appearing in obedience to the summons? being indulged in reading a long argument which would take an hour, to show that the tribunal before which he appeared were usurpers of authority, which they did not legally and rightfully possess. I say that the very denial of authority is contumacious. The Senate of the United States have asserted their authority. If he was an honest witness, if he had nothing in him that he did not wish to disclose, if he had no secret, if he had no guilty conscience, if he appeared before the committee and answered.

Now, sir, I am not going in this case to assert the dignity of the Senate; because I do not suppose the dignity of the Senate is injured at all by the contumaciousness of Mr. Hyatt; but I mean to say that a court of justice, the Senate of the United States, that every tribunal owes something to its own character. This man has been summoned to appear. Instead of answering simply, "I deny your jurisdiction; I say that you had no authority to call me a witness for me; I say you had no authority to issue attachments;" what does he propose to do? He does not content himself simply with a denial of our jurisdiction; but he presents a long written argument, to show that the Senate of the United States are a set of usurpers of authority, and that the Senate of the United States are a power dangerous to civil liberty and to the personal liberty of the citizen. Mr. Thaddeus Hyatt, a contumacious witness, is introduced to the Senate of the United States; now, sir, I am not going to say how to answer that question, but I think the Senate may affect the Senate of the United States, but to say that it is a duty which we owe to ourselves, it is a duty which every tribunal owes to itself, not to be insulted, not to allow insulting answers to be made to questions propounded by them when they are in the legal exercise of their rights, whether as a legal tribunal or as a legislative body.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New Hampshire pause for a moment, until the Chair states the condition of the question before the Senate? The Senator from Louisiana moves to refer this paper to a select committee; the Senator from Connecticut demands that the paper be read, upon the ground that the paper must be read before he can be compelled to vote on the question of reference. The Chair stated to the Senator from Connecticut and to the Senate, that a paper which has to be voted upon, a resolution which has to be voted upon, must be read. That is the general parliamentary law; but he does not suppose it to apply to every class of papers. For example, if a motion were made to refer the report from the coast survey, or the Patent Office report, to a committee, and the reading should be called for, under the 14th rule of the Senate, "if the same shall be objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, and without debate." The Chair considers that a paper of that class, under the general head. He does not think it the right of a Senator to call for the reading of a lengthy paper on a motion to refer, if the desire of the Senate be that it shall not be read. The Chair, however, will direct the paper to be read, as called for by the Senator from Connecticut, unless objection be made.

Mr. DAVIS. I rose for the purpose of making that objection, in order that we might dispose of a subject which seems to be endless.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In which event the Chair will put the question to be read without debate. The motion is, to refer the paper to the select committee. The Senator from Connecticut demands that it be read. Objection being made, the question is, Shall the paper be read? Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. FOSTER. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. Is it ruled that that question must be decided without debate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will refer the Senator to the 14th rule of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I was going to suggest, may it please your Honor—

Mr. BINGHAM. You think it is a court, too.

Mr. HALE. I have got the same heresy, too. [Laughter.] I began to say, under the rule, I want to suggest a single difficulty, and not to make an argument. It seems to me that it would be improper to decide the right of the person to be heard upon a collateral question whether a paper shall be read. I have nothing to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the objection of a Senator to the further reading of the paper; and the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HAMLIN. How is the question put? The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to refer this paper to the select committee. The Senator from Connecticut calls for the reading of it. Objection is made by a Senator. The Chair puts the question to the Senate, Shall the paper be read? Upon this, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. MASON. I would say, in a single word, that I am perfectly satisfied that the refusal to read the paper will rather prolong the matter. If it is referred to the committee, when it comes back again gentlemen will say, "Let us have the paper read," and I would we have it read."

Mr. WIGFALL. I do not intend to join in this debate; I want really to end this matter—

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman; but I believe the question is not open.

Mr. WIGFALL. I do not intend to debate it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not debatable unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. WIGFALL. I do not intend to debate it; but to state merely a simple proposition. It appears to me that the question presented to the Senate is one easy of solution—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must interrupt the Senator from Texas, if objection be made, as, under the rule of the Senate, the question is to be determined without debate.

we are sure they desire to protect the persons who are examined against all injurious consequences from their examination. But it is in vain to deny that this new tribunal has some of the worst features of the Inquisition and other secret tribunals. Such must ever be the case when the legislature nourishes the functions of the judiciary.

"The greatest danger to liberty among us, is the encroachment of one department of Government upon the powers of another, especially of the legislative upon the executive and judicial. This was foreseen by the framers of the Constitution, and ardulously guarded against. If a committee of the Senate can be made a court to try criminal offenses, they can also be invested with power to punish offenders. The next step is as easy as the first. And if the Senate does not now resist, a great stride will be taken towards erecting a great central tribunal in Congress, which will absorb all the reserved rights of the States and of the people.

²² We conclude this division of the argument by stating, what cannot be disputed, that if the resolution vests an unconstitutional power in the committee, the Senate can have no power to enjoin the attendance of witnesses.

If I asked legislation per se to inquire into who set fire to a house, or transferred a person (just a number of them) to a prison, or inquired into the whereabouts of a person, or any act of treason against the United States in any part of the country, probably there is not a member of the Senate who would object. But if I asked legislation to inquire into the shrink back from so outrageous a proposal. Yet this is exactly what the restrictions we are resister has done, e.g. legislation is necessary for the preservation of the peace of the country, &c. This presents the question, whether legislation is necessary to inquire into the motives and purpose of legislation, a right to make an inquiry as to who committed certain crimes? We deny the right. A lawfulness that object which are themselves unlawful and unconstitutional. A medical student has a right to study anatomy, but a legislator has no right to inquire into the motives of the Senate has a right to collect information to aid in legislation, but a right to establish an inquisition for that purpose.

" We now pass to another division of our argument, in some aspects connected with the former, yet one in which we claim the discharge of our client on a ground entirely independent of it.

"We contend that the Senate has no right to compel the attendance of witnesses, except in cases where this body is invested with judicial or quasi judicial functions. The Senate is the sole court to try impeachments, by the express words of the Constitution. Hence it can compel the attendance of witnesses on the trial of an impeachment. It can judge of the elections, qualification, and returns of its own members. Hence, when the election of a Senator is contested, it can compel witnesses to attend. So, having the power of punishing a member for disorderly behavior, and even of expelling him, in such cases the right of compelling the attendance of witnesses follows.

"But beyond these cases the Senate has no power of compelling witnesses to attend. It is the absolute necessity of the power which gives it as an incident to the trial, taken in connection with the function to which it is incidental. To compel witnesses to attend before a committee to give information in regard to proposed legislation, is a power not given by the Constitution. It is not given expressly, and it is not given by implication, because it is not necessary for legislation.

"Nothing misleads so much as false analogies. The Senate bears a resemblance to the British House of Lords, and the House of Representatives to the House of Commons. The legislative functions of these bodies are similar. Hence jurists have sometimes hastily concluded that the whole 'Lex et consuetudo Parliamenti' applied to Congress and other legislative bodies in this country; that our Legislatures and their members had the power and privilege of British Parliament and its members; and that the rights which would be regarded as contemptus and breaches of privilege in England against the Lords or Commons, would also be regarded as such here against the Senate or House.

⁴⁴ But nothing can be more fallacious than this superficial analogy, and every one acknowledges it the instant the tests are applied. The privileges of the British Parliament and the powers of the Lords and Commons are drawn from the very nature of things. The powers and privileges of the range and prices of ages. The powers and privileges of the Senate and House are all created by the Constitution, either in express words, or by necessary implication. Hence, that certain powers have been exercised by the Lords and Commons does not prove that such powers exist here.

[illegible]

¹¹ Acting on this idea, that the powers of the two Houses were like those of Parliament, the Senate, in 1800, committed William Duane for publishing a libel in the Aurora, (2 Benton Mr. Debates, 408 to 426,) thus not only assuming a power not given by the Constitution, but violating the spirit, if not the letter, of that sacred charter, which declares, in the first article of amendment, that Congress shall make no law 'abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.' What is left of the freedom of the press, if the Senate, without passing a law, can decide without appeal what is a libel upon it, and punish the same at its discretion?

"The Senate, in Duane's case, did exactly what the House of Commons did in Sir Francis Basset's, whom they committed to the Tower for publishing a libel on the House. He strongly resisted this outrage, and saved the Speaker of the House and the Sergeant-at-Arms. In that celebrated case, the court considered it was well-established law in England that the House was the final judge of its own privileges, and might punish for contempts at its pleasure. (Hurd's v. Abbott, 14 East's Rep. 1.)

“The enormous length to which the powers of each House of Congress would be carried by admitting for a moment the British parliamentary law as a source of power, demands that every power claimed by either House should be strictly questioned, and, if it has no foundation in the Constitution, be rejected. No enormous were the claims of privilege of both Lords and Commons, that they have not only been restrained by express statute, but moderated in "The Constitution of the United States not only created a new form of government for the people, but for the first time gave them an actually national Government. The powers granted by it have no other foundation than the letter of the instrument. They are limited with the greatest jealousy, and are not to be extended by implication.

"The tenth article of amendments in the Constitution says: 'The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.' We search the Constitution in vain for any delegation of power to compel a witness to appear before a committee of the Senate appointed to investigate a subject as preliminary to legislation.

The fourth article of the amendment provides that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated." If this provision has any vitality, or is ever to be applied, surely it ought to be applied in the present case. Have the Senate committee a right to drag a man one, two, or three thousand miles from his family, however inconvenient or ruinous it may be to him, and this merely to prosecute an investigation, which his trial would surely satisfy? Is it the purpose of this act of legislation? Can any seizure of the person be more unreasonable? Yet the letter and spirit of our great charter are thus to be trampled down by a constructive power.

"By the sixth article of amendment, every accused person is entitled to a speedy and public trial by a jury of the State and district where the crime has been committed. The hardship and injustice of taking a man out of his own State for trial are so apparent that the people would not submit to it. Could they have intended to allow any citizen to be taken from his home, wherever he might be, and have him subjected to an inquisitorial examination, a trial in fact, but one in which he is deprived of all the protection which the Constitution would give him in a regular court of justice?"

"The Constitution enumerates powers and privileges which the Senate enjoys independently of the House, and those which the House enjoys independently of the Senate. They are expressed with great care, with the avowed purpose of defining and limiting them, and preventing the claim of the monstrous and arbitrary powers and privileges that have been exercised by the Lords and Commons.

"The Senate has the sole power to try all impeachments" (Art. I, sec. 3). But it cannot, like the House of Lords, order a convicted party to be executed, or even fine or imprison him. The punishment ordered by the Senate cannot extend further than removal from office and disqualification for holding any office of honor or trust under the United States. And a conviction cannot take place "without the concurrence of two thirds of the members present." Everything in these provisions shows an anxiety to insure a fair trial and a moderate punishment. Can the Senate, by a summary process for contempt, inflict a heavier punishment on a witness who doubts its authority than on a great public offender, duly tried and convicted? Each House is the judge of the elections, returns and qualification of its own members; can compel the attendance of absent members; determine the rules of its proceedings; punish its members for disorderly behavior; and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member.

"Here again, is the same design exhibited to define and limit powers. Each House is the judge of the qualification of its members—that is, whether they have the qualifications required by the Constitution: But it cannot create a tions required by the Constitution; but it cannot create an arbitrary disqualification, as the House of Commons did in the case of John Wilkes, and declare that a man who has been expelled is afterwards ineligible. A member can only be expelled by the concurrence of two thirds of the members present. A bare majority can expel from the House of Commons.

"The members of both Houses are, 'in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, privileged from arrest during the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same.' This is an important privilege, but is nothing compared with those which have been sometimes arrogated by the House of

The powers exercised by the Houses of Parliament have in many instances been as ludicrous as they were tyrannical. A mere enumeration of some of them, for the period of about a century after the Restoration, will sufficiently illustrate the danger of blindly following the parliamentary precedents of Great Britain. The following cases, among many others, were between the years 1660 and 1697 noted Assurances of the House.

- ¹ Delivering ejections to members of Parliament, fifteen cases.
- ² Entry on their estates, twenty-four cases.
- ³ Pulling down a scaffold at Mr. Butle's.
- ⁴ Lopping Mr. Scawen's trees.
- ⁵ Detaining the goods of members of Parliament, ten cases.

ment, but with powers beyond impeachment, with all the administrative powers of justice possessed by the judiciary itself, what could it do in the Harper's Ferry case? Could it, in Washington, in the District of Columbia, arrest and commit in Jefferson County, in the State of Virginia, and could it try them without a jury? But the Constitution says that the trial of crimes, cases, and controversies, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed."

What would be the use of the underground, at its end to the so-called of the proposed inquiries, but only as to the mode, in reference to the rights of witnesses, he writes in the margin the question of the safety of the witnesses.

"For the sake of the point in question, let us also write the right of trial by jury, and admit that in a case of crime like the one under consideration, this honorable Senate sitting as a court judicial with full powers, are conditioned to try this case; and that, in view of the Constitution, they are not to try it in Virginia, instead of at Washington; saving this supposed condition of affairs, what would be my rights as a witness? What would be the rights of any and every citizen of the United States and resident in the State of Virginia? Why clearly, the court, by some process, would be under the necessity of going to the witness? It could not compel any witness not of the State to come to it. For the court to attempt such a thing would be to employ its function as to a triangle down natural rights that are guaranteed by the amendments to the Constitution. And thus it would cease to pass, by the safeguards of the Constitution, that it would have received previous sanction from the people to suffer. I think no man can believe that such was the intention of the framers of the Constitution."

SENATOR MASON.—The Constitution was ordained and established to secure justice, liberty, tranquility, and the general welfare, &c. &c. In the absence of the great struggle, the Constitution established a true Government.

To carry out the design of the Constitution is the separate power of each department, and the common purpose of all.

Let the design of the Constitution should be defined, the rights of the Bill of Rights to it, called the amendments to the Constitution.

The functions of Government are limited by the amendments.

"Concrete processes of every kind and for any purpose are therein forbidden, save in connection with safeguards, nor restrict the power to legislate, nor the power to execute of safeguards promises absence of dangers; absence of dangers promises absence of power to begot them. In what sense the Government of the United States is to be maintained, there is the presumption that power to require them is wanting."

Where the liberties and privileges of the people are involved, the bill determines what are and what are not powers incident to Government.

The Constitution has established both Government and the Bill of Rights in pursuance of a single design, no antagonism between them is supposed.

"The Government being a despotic declaration of the rights, privileges, and immunities of the people; and the powers of Government being not arbitrary, but limited by the amendments, the former must not be subject to the latter."

"The Government, in its essential nature and in the nature of the being voluntary in the first place, its powers must always be construed in favor of the latter."

"For people provide Governments in the order of events, but the rights originate with them."

Inasmuch, then, as Government cannot impair, but must exercise its functions in harmony with the people's protecting summary of powers and privileges, the mode and the form of its invasion, to be constitutional, must be expressed and granted in the bill.

Hence, Government is concluded as to any "incident" power, violative of the people's rights, privileges, and immunities, as secured to them by the Bill of Rights. Such use of power used in the nature of the case for a suspension, and a clear violation of article three, of the amendments. It is not possible that an "incident" power of the Government, which Government could be more secure than the expressed powers of the judiciary.

The undersigned, having thus given his reasons for not having appeared before the select committee of the honorable Senate, would respectfully answer the interrogatory: "Am you ready to appear before said committee and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said committee?" as follows:

"I have been already called upon to appear before said committee at any time, and at any place, and before any committee of the honorable Senate, and is now ready, upon his signature a name and citizen being referred to him by the people's Bill of Rights in the Constitution of his country. He regards himself as a loyal citizen, true to the Constitution because true to the people. To submit to the concrete processes of the Senate's honorable committee, and by this design, to acknowledge a power against whose constitution Washington, Jefferson, and the framers of the Constitution warned and sought to shield their countrymen, would be an act on the part of the undersigned which he could find no reason to believe in him or men. He cannot do it; his judgment does not approve it; his conscience will not permit it.

All which is dutifully and respectfully submitted.

THADDEUS HYATT.

Attest: W. F. M. ARV. —

WASHINGTON, District of Columbia, ss.

Personally appeared before the subscriber, a justice of the peace in and for the county of Washington, District of Columbia, Thaddeus Hyatt, of the said county of Washington, being affirmed according to law, acknowledged and declared the foregoing, to which he has affixed his name and seal, and be his answer to the interrogatory of the honorable Senate by the resolution of the United States Senate, adopted the 30th of March, 1860. Given under my hand and seal this 30th day of March, A. D. 1860.

THADDEUS HYATT.

Admitted and authorized before me.

JOHN D. CLARK, Justice of the Peace.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, the Senate, at an early period of its session, appointed a committee to investigate the late invasion and seizure of the arsenal and public property at Harper's Ferry, and of the facts and incidents connected with it; and, as it always does on like occasions, the committee gave power to its members to examine persons and papers.

In the course of the investigation, among the witnesses summoned was Thaddeus Hyatt, of the city of New York. The committee reported to the Senate that this witness did not appear in pursuance of the summons; that he failed and refused to appear. Upon that report the Senate, as has been done in like cases in the House of Representatives, there being no precedent in the Senate that I could find, passed a resolution directing the President of the Senate to issue his warrants for the arrest of Thaddeus Hyatt. He was arrested accordingly, in the city of Boston, by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and brought to the bar of the Senate. The Senate then, in pursuance of the precedents of the House, having none, as I have said, in this body of a like character, by its resolution, directed the President of the Senate, to put to Thaddeus Hyatt two questions; and further directed that these questions should be answered by him on a day given; which was to-day, in writing and under oath. The questions were these:

"1. What excuse have you for not appearing before the select committee of the Senate, in pursuance of the summons served on you on the 30th day of January, 1860?"

In answer to that question, the witness has put in a paper, the substance of which is, as I have heard portions of it read, a denial of the authority of the Senate, in the case before the Senate, to bring him before a committee for the inquiries proposed by the previous order of the Senate. He denies the authority of the Senate; and embodies in his paper an argument which he declares, in the answer, is the argument of his counsel.

He says, as his excuse for not appearing before the committee, the excuse being that, in his judgment, the Senate had no power to bring him here.

So much for the first question. In answer to the second question, which was:

"Are you now ready to appear before said committee, and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said committee?"

The witness replies briefly, with comparative brevity at least, that he is now, and has always been, ready to appear before any committee of the Senate, anywhere, provided his rights as a citizen are not respected. Upon this subject, the resolution—are respected. Upon this subject, the answer is evasive, and intended to be so. The question is: "Are you ready to appear and answer?" The answer is in direct conflict with the report of the committee, that he never did appear pursuant to the summons. The answer is that he has always been ready to appear; but he audaciously avoids saying that he is ready to answer the questions the committee shall put to him. That being the case, I move that the Senate adopt the following resolution, which I have also taken from the present of the House of Representatives in like case.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will state that the motion before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Louisiana to refer this paper to the select committee.

Mr. MASON. I suppose that is withdrawn now.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That motion was made for the purpose of preventing the reading the paper here, and allowing us to go on with our regular business; but the paper directed being read, of course I withdrew the motion.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolutions offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The Secretary read them, as follows: "Whereas, Thaddeus Hyatt has refused to appear before the select committee of the Senate, in pursuance of the summons served on him by order of the Senate, and has not purged himself of the contempt with which he stands charged; Therefore, Resolved, That Thaddeus Hyatt be committed by the Sergeant-at-Arms to the common jail of the District of Columbia, to be kept there until he shall signify his willingness to answer the questions proposed to him by the select committee of the Senate, and to appear before said committee on a day to be appointed to him by said committee; and, for the contempt and detention of the said Thaddeus Hyatt, this resolution be a warrant for his arrest."

Resolved. That whenever the officer having the said Thaddeus Hyatt in custody shall be informed by said Hyatt that he is ready and willing to answer the proper and legal questions that may be propounded to him by the said committee, it shall be the duty of such officer to deliver the said Thaddeus Hyatt over to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to take the said Hyatt immediately before the committee before which he was summoned to appear, for a examination, and to hold him in custody subject to the further order of the Senate.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. HALE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask a single question of the chairman. I see that the warrant is general; it is a detention without any limitation of time. I suppose if we had any power to commit him, the power would only exist during the session of the Senate. Does the chairman of the committee so understand the powers of the Senate?

Mr. MASON. The Senate is a continuous body. It always is in existence, not always in session; and if the witness refrained from answering the questions, I presume, under that order of the Senate, unless before the adjournment something be done with him, he will remain in custody.

Mr. WIGFALL. A habeas corpus would settle the question, if any difficulty should arise.

Mr. HALE. I suppose that would be a writ corpus to a prisoner that is under such a warrant as that, with such a judiciary as we have here, would be adding (if anybody else but a Senator had said it) insult to injury.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, this question to me, I confess, up to the time that the little discussion took place the other day, was entirely new, and for one, I am not now prepared to vote to say that I believe that, under the Constitution of the United States, we have the power to imprison a man in the District of Columbia, without a jury and testify as to any facts within his knowledge. I confess that, up to the time that question was raised, it did not occur to my mind, knowing that legislative bodies had been in the habit of appointing committees and sending for persons and papers. For myself, I should desire that the decision of the question might be postponed till Monday next, before I am called on to vote.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the Senator give way for a moment to adjourn? I move that the Senate adjourn. "Oh, no!"

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn. I think we had better end this question now.

Mr. MASON. Before that is done, I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion. We must make some disposition, I presume, of the witness, in the meantime.

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. MASON. If the Senate do not act upon the resolutions which I offered this evening, there will be no order. He does not get forward, I presume, to remand him to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to suggest to gentlemen that it is hardly advisable to push this matter too far. I have previously expressed my sympathy to vote upon the subject. I would make no suggestion in relation to it; but one Senator on this side of the Chamber says he is not prepared to vote now, and that he wishes further time for deliberation. I will say to Senators that, in the course of short examination I have been able to give to this question, I have been led to entertain some doubt myself in reference to the power of the Senate. I wish further time to examine and deliberate upon that subject. There can be no very particular reason for sending it now more than at any other time.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I beg leave to say that I took it for granted that the Senate had made up its mind on the question. It is one that has been so much discussed generally in legislative bodies, and was so much discussed in the House of Representatives in the reference to it that I took it for granted every Senator had an opinion on it; and my object was simply to have a vote at this time—nothing beyond that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say to Senators, that so far as my examination goes, the subject has not heretofore been presented exactly in the shape in which it now comes before the Senate. The proceedings in the House of Repre-mentaries were entirely upon a different class of cases; and there is a distinction to be drawn, as is contended, between this case and others—many think a serious and important distinction. At any rate, no harm can be done by deliberation, and settling it on due consideration. I will say to Senators, that I am as ready and willing and anxious to uphold all the privileges of this body as any man, and to support whatever our rights may be; but while feeling that, am anxious not to go one step further—not to make a precedent that we cannot stand by. I should like very much indeed to have the matter go over, in order that we may think of it until Monday; and I hope Senators will not, on consideration, have any objection to that course.

Mr. MASON. I have not evinced the slightest indisposition to adjourn the question until Monday. I did not know until now that we had ordered an adjournment to be until Monday; but if it is the wish of the Senate, I do not press the resolution now, though I am perfectly prepared to vote myself.

Mr. SEWARD. I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MASON. This resolution, whether we act on the others or not, is necessary, and I offer it.

Ordered, That Theodore Tilton be returned to the custody of the Sergeant at Arms, there to remain until the further order of the Senate.

The order was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I now renew the resolutions that I offered before this superseded them—to commit him to jail.

Mr. SEWARD. They will be over, I suppose. Mr. MASON. They will be left as unfinished business, if it shall be the pleasure of the Senate now to adjourn.

Mr. SEWARD. I move an adjournment.

Mr. BIGLER. Will the Senator waive the motion for a moment, to allow us to offer a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. SEWARD. Certainly.

CONTRACTS FOR MARBLE.

Mr. BIGLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his judgment incompatible with the public interest, the letter of J. F. Conally to the Secretary of War, dated on or about the 16th January, 1860, in relation to his offer for marble columns for the porticoes of the Capitol extension; also all orders or instructions, and action of the Secretary of War and of the Superintendent of the Capitol extension; and also any communication that may have been made by the contractors in relation to said columns, or to the contracts or bids therefor, not already communicated to the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe an order has been taken by the Senate to adjourn over to Monday. I move a reconsideration, in order that we may sit to-morrow. There is a great deal of unfinished business before the Senate. I think we ought to meet every day in the week while that state of things exists.

Mr. HALE. I simply want to inquire if the Senator from Mississippi voted in the affirmative on this question. He did not so state.

Mr. DAVIS. It is necessarily so considered, as I did not vote at all.

Mr. HALE. I suppose, if the Senator was present and did not vote at all, that is enough.

Mr. DAVIS. I was not present when the proposition was made, or I should have objected to it.

Mr. HALE. Then I raise the question that it is not in order for him to move a reconsideration.

Mr. GRIMES. It was present when the motion was made.

Mr. HALE. Well, did you vote in the affirmative?

Mr. GRIMES. I did not vote at all, but was here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved to reconsider the vote by which it was ordered, that when the Senate adjourn it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BROWN. I think the motion to fix the time to which we adjourn always takes precedence. ("Oh, no.")

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. Which has precedence between the two questions?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion to adjourn takes precedence.

Mr. DAVIS. Over a proposition to adjourn to a given time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Over a proposition to reconsider the vote fixing the adjournment to a given day. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 25, noes 13; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 9, 1860.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. R. J. COWE.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Before the reading was concluded, Mr. DAVIDSON moved that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman's motion cannot be received during the reading of the Journal.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Well, sir, I object to the reading of the Journal in the absence of a quorum. A quorum is evidently not present.

The SPEAKER. The reading was commenced without objection; and the Chair thinks it cannot be interrupted.

The reading was then concluded; and the Journal was approved.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. CORTIS, FAIRBANKS, PHELPS, DAVIS of Maryland, SCOTT, RICE, FENTON, SMITH of Virginia, TAYLOR, KELLOGG of Michigan, BLAIR, ABRAMS, HANCOCK, FARRIS, and SEAR, the select committee under the resolution of the House of the 5th instant, on the subject of a railroad to the Pacific.

The SPEAKER also appointed Messrs. COVODE, OLIN, WINSLOW, TAIN, and ROBINSON of Illinois, the committee under the resolution of the 5th instant, to inquire into certain alleged corruptions and abuses on the part of officers of the Government, and as to the employment of money to carry elections.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting for the use of the House, the report of Professor J. D. Bachs, Superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, stating the progress of that work during the year ending November 1, 1859, accompanied by an engraved map, showing the general progress made in the survey of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts; and also a manuscript map, prepared at the coast survey office, in accordance with the act of Congress approved March 3, 1853; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House, the report of the Representative of the 13th district, the report of Edward T. Boale, relating to the construction of a wagon road from Fort Smith, Arkansas, to the Colorado river; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House calling on the Treasury Department for a copy of the report of the art commission, a copy of that report, and stating that there were no documents accompanying the report; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRAIN submitted a motion to print extra copies; which, under the law, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. OTERO obtained the floor.

Mr. CARTER. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. FLORENCE. The gentleman cannot take the floor from the gentleman who holds it for any purpose.

Mr. OTERO, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill providing for the appointment of two additional Indian agents in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. OTERO also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill providing for the payment of certain volunteer companies in the service of the United States in the suppression of Indian hostilities in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

NEW YORK SEVENTH REGIMENT.

Mr. CARTER. I rise to a question of privilege. I find stated in the Globe of March 3, that which is now made.

"Whereas a resolution recently introduced into the House by the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. CRAIG),"

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. I rise to a question of order. The Chair has decided again and again that no newspaper articles can raise a question of privilege.

Mr. CARTER. It is not a mere newspaper article; it is a statement made in this House, affecting the character of one of the members in this House. If that does not constitute a question of privilege, I should like to know what would constitute one?

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from New Jersey was the other day prevented from discussing the resolution which the gentleman from New York refers, on the ground that the resolution did not constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. CARTER. I will read the resolution, and then submit to the House whether it does not involve a question of privilege.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has repeatedly decided that a mere newspaper article is not a question of privilege. If it were, the House might be continually occupied with such questions, to the exclusion of all business. Will the gentleman refer to the resolution offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. ABRAMS), in relation to the seventh regiment, to which the gentleman from New York (Mr. CARTER) refers, the Chair will say, that resolution of the gentleman from New York was, in the first place, only read for information; and being objected to, it was withdrawn. The resolution of the gentleman from New Jersey was, in the same way, read for information, objected to, and withdrawn. That is the way the matter stands. CRAIG, therefore, nothing on the subject before the House.

Mr. CARTER. There is upon the records the statement of one member of the House reflecting upon another member of the House. Does not that involve a question of privilege?

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. I call the gentleman to order. I think we have heard enough, in relation to that seventh regiment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot care that the remarks of the gentleman from New York are in order. He would be very happy to hear him, if it were objected.

Mr. CARTER. I do not understand the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that objection is made to the gentleman's proceeding; and the Chair cannot hear him, unless it be in relation to a question of privilege.

Mr. CARTER. Well, sir, the Chair cannot prevent me from stating my question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. State your question of order.

Mr. CARTER. I will state my question of order.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. I thought the gentleman rose to a question of privilege, not a question of order.

Mr. CARTER. Well, I will state my question of privilege. I predicate my question of privilege upon the resolution which I will now read.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. I call the gentleman from New York to order. The Speaker, I understand, has already decided that the subject referred to by the gentleman is not a question of privilege.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair has undoubtedly so decided.

Mr. CARTER. Then I will state to the Speaker, that I suppose—[cries of "Order!"] Well, I presume I have the right to state my question. The Chair awarded me the floor.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair awarded the floor to the gentleman; but the Chair has decided that what the gentleman states is not a question of privilege. He is therefore not in order.

Mr. CARTER. The Chair decided, as I understood him, that I could not read this article. I propose, therefore, to state what it is. The gentleman from New Jersey offered a resolution which reflects upon the character of a member of the House.

Mr. CRAIGIE, of North Carolina. I call the gentleman to order.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that the gentleman from New Jersey was not permitted to address the House upon his resolution, and that the Chair has decided that it does not involve a privileged question.

Mr. CARTER. The resolution of the gentleman from New Jersey, however, was read for information. I appeal from the decision of the Chair to the House.

The question was taken; and it was decided that the decision of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the House.

CONFIRMATION OF LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. NOELL, by unanimous consent, previous notice having been given, introduced a bill to confirm certain entries of land therein named; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

HORSES LOST IN WAR.

Mr. NOELL, by unanimous consent, previous notice having been given, also introduced a bill to provide for payment for horses lost in the military service of the United States; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ELIZABETH M. COCKE.

Mr. NIXON. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to move that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 81, for the relief of Elizabeth M. Cocke, widow of Major Thomas H. Cocke, late marshal of the district of Texas, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to which committee it properly belongs.

It was ordered accordingly.

Mr. STANTON. What is the regular order of business?

THE SPEAKER. The call of committees for reports of a private bill.

Mr. STANTON. Then I call for the regular order of business. I do not think that it is fair that committees should get in their reports out of order.

THE SPEAKER. The report first in order, upon this day, under the rules of the House, is from the Committee on Claims, on reports from the Court of Claims. If there is no report of that character now to be made, the call of committees will be commenced where it was left off on Friday last. Reports are in order from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MARY ANN HENRY.

Mr. DRABSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Mrs. Mary Ann Henry; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN SANDEL.

Mr. MARTIN, of Ohio, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to John Sandel; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ABRAHAM CRUM.

Mr. MARTIN, of Ohio, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting a pension to Abraham Crum; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EMMA A. WOOD.

Mr. MARTIN, of Ohio, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Emma A. Wood, widow of late Brevet Major George F. Wood of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANTHONY W. BAGARD.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Anthony W. Bagard, an invalid soldier of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELMIRA WHITE.

Mr. FOSTER, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Elmira White, widow of Captain Thomas R. White; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EXCUSED FROM SERVICE ON A COMMITTEE.

Mr. RICE, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully ask to be excused from serving upon the Committee for the District of Columbia. I should have made this request earlier, but that I was absent when the committees were appointed and for a considerable period afterwards; and in presenting it now, I trust that I do not unduly diminish the importance of that committee, and I am certainly not wanting in respect and cordiality towards the gentlemen who compose it. But the people whom I have the honor to represent have only that concern in the subjects before that committee which an intelligent and patriotic community, far hundred miles distant, may be supposed to feel in the local affairs of the Federal capital; while they have great and distinctive interests important to themselves and closely related to the welfare of the whole country, which necessarily require recognition in consulting the committees of this House, and to those interests, and others of a general character, I desire to devote my attention, through such means and opportunities as may open to me. The question was taken on excusing Mr. Rice from serving on the committee; and the motion was agreed to.

SMITH & HUNT, OF TOLEDO, OHIO.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WASHBURN] has been called home by sickness in his family, and he has requested me to make a report for him from the Committee on Commerce. It is a bill for the relief of Smith & Hunt, of Toledo, Ohio.

There was no objection; and the bill was received, read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN H. HUNTER.

Mr. STOKES, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 219) granting a pension to Major John H. Hunter; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANDREW E. MARSHALL.

Mr. HALL, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Andrew E. Marshall; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

COLONEL BENJAMIN WILSON, DECEASED.

Mr. VANCE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a report from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. I was not present when that committee was called.

There was no objection.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Colonel Benjamin Wilson, deceased; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REV. JAMES CRAIGIE.

Mr. VANCE, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of the Rev. James Craigie, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF PAGES.

Mr. SPINNER. I desire to offer the following resolutions from the Committee of Accounts: Resolved, That so much of the resolution of the House of Representatives, passed May 17, 1856, as relates to the compensation of the Doorkeeper of the House and its employees, is hereby rescinded, and declared inoperative from the date of its passage, so far as the same conflict with any joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, passed July 30, 1854.

Resolved, That so much of said resolution as limits the number of pages to twelve, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and that the Doorkeeper be authorized, from time to time, to employ such persons as may be deemed necessary, not exceeding twenty pages, between the ages of ten and sixteen years, at a compensation of two dollars per day for each, during the session of Congress; and that the Committee of Accounts be authorized to allow pay to the persons who acted as pages pending the election of officers of this House, to be included in the day on which the Doorkeeper was elected, at the rate of two dollars each per day.

Mr. RUFFIN. I object to the introduction of that resolution. It is not a private bill. I make that point, and ask the Chair to decide it.

Mr. SPINNER. Mr. Speaker, if it cannot be introduced as a private bill—

Mr. BURNETT. This question is not debatable.

THE SPEAKER. It is not debatable; but the gentleman from New York can state the ground upon which he presents the resolution.

Mr. SPINNER. The ground, then, is, that the resolution relates to employees of this House—individuals who have performed their services, and are now ready to go home. We have no other mode of securing them their pay than this. These claims are private, of course, as the public have no interest in them.

Mr. RUFFIN. I desire to be allowed to make a statement, and to make an inquiry of the gentleman from New York. I wish to know whether the late Doorkeeper of the House did not put some eight or ten pages upon the floor of the House beyond the number he was authorized to appoint; and whether they are not the pages who are now claiming pay? He was authorized to appoint twelve pages. I understand some twelve have been paid, and that some eight more are claiming compensation.

Mr. SPINNER. I will state, in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, that it is the general custom of this House to vote an additional number of pages, or pay to an additional number. The Senate to-day has twenty pages, while we have but twelve.

Mr. RUFFIN. I do not understand the gentleman. Have not twelve pages already been paid?

Mr. SPINNER. Twelve have been paid, and eight more are claiming pay. They continued in service during the disorganized state of the House.

Mr. COX. Have they rendered the services?

Mr. SPINNER. They have.

Mr. RUFFIN. There was a resolution passed last Congress authorizing the appointment of twelve pages, and no more.

Mr. SPINNER. But the House voted for the pay of eight pages at the close of the session.

Mr. RUFFIN. Has that resolution ever been repealed?

Mr. SPINNER. No, sir.

Mr. RUFFIN. The resolution of this House never authorized the Doorkeeper to employ these eight pages. He appointed them without authority of law, and against the order of the House. There never has been a law of this House authorizing their employment.

Mr. SPINNER. I desire to say that the House passed a resolution at the close of the last session by which eight of these pages were to be paid. They were continued by the Doorkeeper, supposing that they would be paid again.

Mr. RUFFIN. It amounts to this: that a resolution was passed by this House authorizing and requiring the Doorkeeper to employ twelve pages, and no more. There never had been, previous to that time, more than fourteen.

Mr. SPINNER. And twenty have been paid. Mr. RUFFIN. Yes, sir; the Doorkeeper, notwithstanding the resolution of the House, went on and appointed more than he was authorized to appoint, and now they ask pay.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to say a word in reply to what has fallen from the gentleman from North Carolina. My understanding of the facts is this: that after the House reduced the number to twelve, as has already been stated, an additional number of pages absolutely forced themselves upon the Doorkeeper, and asked his permission to let them run upon the floor, taking their chance of pay from the House; that the Doorkeeper did not intend to violate the order of the House; but that he did, from the great pressure made upon him by those pages, permit them to run upon the floor, taking their chance of pay.

Mr. RUFFIN. That makes the matter no better.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not know of any content being given by any member of this House; certainly none was given by me. I knew nothing of the arrangement at the time it came to my knowledge subsequently. I did not approve of the conduct of the Doorkeeper in that particular; but I have said thus much in his defense. I was decidedly opposed to increasing the number of pages, and voted with the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Kentucky, who introduced the original proposition to reduce the number.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from North Carolina has been more inclined to blame the Doorkeeper than probably he would be had he looked at all the facts. I understand the facts to be, that there were more than twelve pages in the House; that the House passed a resolution establishing twelve as the number of pages, beyond which the Doorkeeper was not to go. The pages thereby excluded, and the reason they gave for the Doorkeeper to allow them to run upon the floor, and take their chance for pay.

I understand also from the Doorkeeper—for I remonstrated with him upon the subject a few days ago, and after the first effort of the gentleman from New York introduced this resolution—that nothing was done at the solicitation, in the main, of members of the House; he stating to the members that he was not authorized to receive them. But members insisted that he should allow the pages to remain here, taking their chance of pay from the House. These are the circumstances under which the Doorkeeper acted.

Mr. RUFFIN. Gentlemen will remember that the first session of the last Congress disgraced this Doorkeeper for this very thing, because he employed a larger number of pages than he was authorized by law. But immediately after that action, and in the face of it, the House having declared the number of messengers and pages to be employed by the Doorkeeper, the Doorkeeper goes on and employs twenty. Gentlemen say that has been customary. That is the object of this resolution was to prevent this thing. According to my recollection it had not been customary, previous to that time, to employ more than fourteen pages; and there never have been twenty pages until the close of the last session of Congress. There are pages here now who are actually in the way; little boys of eight or ten years old, who cannot write members' names, who cannot write their own names, and who are kept here so that they or their friends may draw the pay which they who are competent to do the business are entitled to. If we had twelve good, competent boys here, they would be amply sufficient for the use of the House. That has been tested heretofore.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to say a word or two in behalf of these innocent boys.

Mr. RUFFIN. Do not let them off the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought the gentleman from North Carolina had got through.

Mr. RUFFIN. I had not.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will get up and say, body else occupies the floor. Let us have an equal chance for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor, if he wishes to keep it. Otherwise, he will please to yield it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought the gentleman from North Carolina had got through.

Mr. HURNETT. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York one question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield the floor?

Mr. RUFFIN. Yes, temporarily.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Georgia is entitled to the floor, if the gentleman from North Carolina yields it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I object to the gentleman from North Carolina farming out the floor. Let us take it in turn.

Mr. RUFFIN. I wish to learn the facts of the case, if I am not permitted to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I rise to a question of order. I wish to inquire whether this debate is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. LOVEJOY. If so, then it is all right.

Mr. RUFFIN. I wish the gentleman from New York to state—he is on the Committee of Accounts, and ought to know—how many pages there are on the floor at this time?

Mr. SPINNER. I do not know; and it is for that very reason that I desire to fix the number, so that the House may be understanding it. The Committee of Accounts are already instructed against him. We want to be disencumbered of such instruction, and it was in that view that this resolution was reported. The resolution was unanimously agreed to in the committee. A similar one was agreed to the last day but one of the last session of Congress; and on the last day of that session, the House adopted a resolution, directing the claims of these employes to be made out by the Clerk, and paid at the Treasury. Payment was refused at the Treasury on the ground that they were all included in the record. It was decided that each account should be presented separately, and each audited and certified by the Committee of Accounts.

That mandatory resolution against the joint resolution of both Houses still stands. We consider it rather directory to us, but illegal. We could now pass the accounts for the legal amount, but we prefer to have the illegal resolution rescinded by the House. It is with that view that we have presented this resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then the gentleman and other question which I wish to ask. Gentlemen say that I have probably done injustice to the late Doorkeeper.

Mr. SPINNER. I did not say so.

Mr. RUFFIN. No; but other gentlemen on this side have thought so; and have said that they have done the late Doorkeeper injustice in stating that he employed, without authority, eight additional pages. It has been suggested to me that the Committee of Accounts, considering that the resolution passed last Congress was contrary to the law, had themselves authorized him to employ them.

Mr. SPINNER. No, sir; so far as the pages are concerned, the resolution does not contain anything contrary to law. It only applies to the Doorkeeper. I desire further to state to the House, regarding the compensation of the messengers of the House is fixed by law; just the same as the compensation of the messengers of the Senate. During the high state of excitement, the pay of the messengers of former Doorkeeper was reduced below what is paid to messengers of the same grade in the Senate, and to messengers of the same grade in our post office, and in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Their pay is reduced some eighteen or twenty per cent., while the members have voted themselves one hundred per cent. additional compensation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words in behalf of these innocent boys, who are demanding their pay through this resolution. If I understand the state of the facts, they are three—first, if I am wrong, the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee of Accounts, will please correct me; I understand that, by a joint resolution of both Houses, the Doorkeeper of the House was entitled to employ twenty pages.

Mr. SPINNER. No, sir; there is no law whatever relating to pages.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I understand that the resolution of last Congress restricted the Door-keeper to the employment of twelve pages; but that, two months before the close of the session, the House provided for paying twenty pages. Am I right in that?

Mr. SPINNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On this page, some seven or eight, whose pay is intended to be provided for by this resolution, were appointed by the Doorkeeper of the last House of Representatives, and were paid as pages of that House. Several days before the 5th of December last, they were summoned by the Doorkeeper to attend at this House as pages. They did attend, until the new Doorkeeper was elected, and have performed the service; and I say, without reference to any technicality, without reference to any existing law or regulation, that those boys who performed the service are entitled to their pay; and the House of Representatives ought not to hesitate one moment in paying these boys who performed this service as pages. One of them I know to have served as a page during the whole of last session of Congress. He served up to the time the new Doorkeeper was elected, and he was dismissed. He served as faithfully as any page on this floor.

Now, I want to ask if the House of Representatives will allow this service to have been done, and then refuse to pay for it on the technical ground that the Doorkeeper did not have authority to appoint? I raise no issue at all as to whether or not the Doorkeeper had the right to appoint these pages. Certain it is that he did it, and that they performed the service. If he transcended his power, it simply amounts to this—nothing more; that the Doorkeeper did what he thought he ought not to have done; while these innocent boys who are demanding their pay have done what they ought to have done. They have performed this service, and, in my judgment, the House of Representatives would disgrace itself if it were to refuse to pay them.

Mr. FLORENCE. It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, a work of supererogation, after the very clear and just explanation given by the gentleman from Georgia of the relations which these boys have to the House, to refuse to pay them. I merely desire to refer gentlemen to the practice that has existed here ever since I have been a member of the House. There has not been a single Congress—and gentlemen who have been here will justify the remarks that we have not, at the end of the session, paid the pages who were allowed to occupy places; or, in the familiar phrase, to run on the floor. The pressure on the officers of the House is very great. There is, as every one knows, a very great pressure to get these positions. The compensation paid is very considerable. There are widows here who are constantly running after these people, [laughter], and asking members to exert their influence with the Doorkeeper to permit their sons to be on the floor, and take their chance of payment. Gentlemen cannot do this without being wise.

Mr. COBB. I am required by the old Doorkeeper, to ask the gentleman from New York, who, I believe, was a member of the last Committee of Accounts, whether that committee did not authorize Mr. Wright to employ additional pages.

Mr. SPINNER. I think there was conversation in the committee-room, in which a majority of the committee consented that the additional pages should remain, and agreed to offer a resolution for their payment.

Mr. FLORENCE. That is a further justification. Now, Mr. Speaker, under the old practice, extra compensation ($300) was paid not only to the regular pages, but to the extra pages, besides the per diem, and that is the reason why these boys are permitted to run on the floor, and the reason why they are now asking for payment. They were paid, by a resolution of the House, up to the adjournment of the last Congress; and, as all the officers held over, I put it to gentlemen, would it not be unjust now to drive away these little boys, and say they did not hold over with the others?

Mr. RUFFIN. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, you may do so. Ask twenty, if you like.

Mr. SPINNER. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I want him to answer if he can, if the pages who were here last Congress, that he speaks of, were listed among the twelve who had received their pay?

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MARCH 13, 1860.

NEW SERIES.—No. 69.

Mr. FLORENCE. No, of course not.

Mr. SPINNER. I will answer the question. Here is a young lad—Todd, whom you all know. He was a regular page last session. He came on, and supposed that he was to be a page this session; but he was left off the regular list of twelve pages, and is one of the eight who cannot be paid.

Mr. RUFFIN. That is exactly what I want to get at. I believe these new pages have been put upon the floor for effect.

Mr. FLORENCE. Coming as this resolution does from the Committee of Accounts, it is almost unnecessary to say a word in relation to it. We know how rigid and just the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] the chairman of that committee, is. We know that he would not permit anything to pass the committee, if he could prevent it, that would favor of injustice. I am very well convinced of that.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman says that we know the rigid character for justice of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FLORENCE. Oh, I do not want that criticism.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I want to know how the gentleman knows that.

Mr. FLORENCE. There have been opportunities enough of knowing it. I know it by his general character upon the floor, as a rigid guardian of the Treasury, who watches close any attempts to plunder it. He needs no eulogy from me.

But, sir, I will conclude. I do not want to occupy the time of the House. I know that the opinion of the House will sustain the report of the committee; and hence, I said, when I rose, that it was a work of supererogation to attempt to enlighten the House further, after the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia. But I desire to say that no resolution of this House can repeal an existing law which governs the pay of its members, and we are, therefore, bound to pay them.

Mr. MAYNARD. These resolutions bring up, as I conceive, a question that is by no means a new one in the history of the proceedings of this body. A practice has grown up—a vicious one, I conceive it to be—for which members of the House are more responsible than any one else.

We know that there is a great pressure upon the principal officers of the House for the subordinate places. They are limited to the appointment of only a certain number. Others are permitted to act, and are willing to act, in the hope and expectation that their services will be recognized and paid for by the House. Members, either with or without a knowledge of the facts—legally presumed to have a knowledge of it—see them employed from day to day, and from week to week, until the end of the session; and then they cancel, in justice to those persons, who have so rendered their services, as it seems to me, refuse to pay them. I submit whether we, knowing that there are upon the floor at this time a number of supernumerary pages, not warranted by law and by the authority of the Doorkeeper employing them day after day—knowing, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, that many of them are the sons of widowed mothers, who are dependent for their subsistence upon the services of these lads—whether we will acquit ourselves of their services, and then, at the end of the time, turn them adrift without compensation. I am in favor of paying these boys, and all others that have been employed, whether they were appointed by due authority or not; but I am in favor of paying the number of our officers ascertained and all other supernumeraries legally permitted to go away. So far as services have been rendered in the past, I think they ought to be paid for; and if anybody is to blame, it is the members of the House, and not the Doorkeeper or any other officer of the House, as I conceive; because their action has been known to many members of the House, and tacitly acquiesced in. So far as I am concerned, I am not interested in any page here. I have no constituent among them, nor have I the son of any constituent; but, upon principles of justice, I think compensation should be paid to those who have performed service. I am still further of the opinion that we have a great many unnecessary employes about the House.

And I may be permitted to go a step further, and comment upon a practice which strikes me with extreme pain. The very first week that I took my seat in the House, we had a change of the officers of the House, and the former Doorkeeper was not elected, but another one was put in his place. The little pages who had got familiar with their duties and with the Capitol, and were able to attend to the wants of members, were turned adrift, and others were put in their places who had to wait weeks before they were fit adequately to discharge their duties. The same thing has occurred, to some extent, at the present session; and this practice, and the commencement of every Congress, of turning out the pages who are valuable from the personal knowledge and experience that they have obtained, and for their personal qualities, on political or other grounds, and bringing in a parcel of new and raw boys, is one which, to me, is very inconvenient as well as very expensive.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to call the attention of gentlemen, and particularly of the chairman of the Committee of Accounts, to the resolution passed by the House last session. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ not exceeding fourteen messengers at a compensation of $3 a day each per annum; and not exceeding eleven messengers at a compensation of $2 a day during the session of Congress; and not exceeding four laborers at a compensation of $1 50 a day during the year; and not exceeding five laborers at a compensation of $1 a day; and not exceeding twelve pages between the ages of ten and sixteen at a compensation of $3 per day, during the session of Congress."

Mr. SPINNER. I am aware of that resolution.

Mr. BURNETT. Now, there is one thing to which I wish to call the attention of the House. This resolution which the gentleman from New York wants to pass, and which gentlemen advocate, claiming that it ought to pass, to pay eight boys, making them the means by which it to be put through this House, increases the pay of every one of these messengers—every one of them.

Mr. SPINNER. Permit me one moment. I put it expressly upon the ground that that resolution is in violation of law, and that the House had no right to pass it.

Mr. BURNETT. This House has no right to control the number of its employes, says the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SPINNER. No; I did not say that. The compensation is regulated by law, and not the number. But we had the joint resolution. It is the joint resolution of 1854.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; I understand that, and I am going to refer to it.

Mr. SPINNER. It fixes not the number, but the compensation of the employes.

Mr. BURNETT. At the last session of Congress we remedied the evil, and now there are more employes around this Capitol, in my judgment, than there ever have been before. We passed this session a resolution here calling upon the Doorkeeper for a list of the employes under him, and the number of pages upon this floor, to which he has failed to respond. I knew that this resolution was coming. The employes round the Capitol have been appealing to members upon this floor, saying that they would come up, and that by means of it we shall put into their pockets—the men standing here holding the doors open—from two to three hundred dollars extra compensation. They did appeal to us to pass this resolution, and hence I offered my resolution calling upon the Doorkeeper for a list of the employes under him. To that resolution he has made no response, and we have no list of the employes under him. It is true, he explained to me that the reason why he had not furnished his list was, that he had been advised by the Committee of Accounts to wait until they should have an opportunity to present a resolution, which is a new error of the House. Now, sir, whatever may have been the recommendation of the Committee of Accounts, it was the duty of the Doorkeeper, when a resolution of this House was passed calling upon him for information, calling upon him for a list of his employes, to have them ready to wait upon the House promptly. The Doorkeeper is authorized, under the resolution of the last Congress, to employ fourteen messengers, at three dollars per day. Will any gentleman tell me that that is not a sufficient compensation for the service required? Do not gentlemen know that if these men are not satisfied with that compensation there are a very large number of persons applying to do work at that rate? There are a plenty who want it.

But, sir, this resolution is to have a retroactive effect. It goes back in its operation to the commencement of the last Congress, and gives to all the employes under the Doorkeeper of that Congress an additional compensation of several hundred dollars for each man. Is this House going to pass a resolution that will pay full compensation to these men, and then apply the same principle to the contempt of the authority of the House. I care not who did it, or who authorized it to be done, it was in contempt of the order of the House; because they directed that only twelve pages should be appointed. They also limited the number of messengers and laborers, stating how many of each should be employed. Do you want to violate that resolution? And when the chairman of the Committee of Accounts comes here, with a resolution asking this House to pay these eight boys, does not any one know, and if so, why does he not inform the House, that the effect of his resolution will be to allow every messenger employed by the Doorkeeper during the last Congress to claim the full compensation fixed by the joint resolution of 1854? Does he know that the Committee of Accounts will then claim of every one to correspond with the rates fixed by that resolution?

Mr. SPINNER. That is begging the entire question. I said they were entitled to that rate of compensation under the law, and that the benefit of the resolution will apply to all. I have no doubt that they would get that rate of compensation without the passage of this resolution. The House, at the close of the last session, passed a resolution which would have authorized the Committee of Accounts to audit those accounts. They were, however, made up after the members of the Committee of Accounts had left the city. They were unanimous in the last Congress, as they are in this Congress, upon this subject. But these employes were not paid, for the reason that they would all put upon this proposition to repeal that resolution for the purpose of disembarassing the House, and relieving it from the false position in which it had placed itself by the passage of a resolution in contravention of law.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman from New York makes this singular position; but I think that these men can now be paid under the law without any action on the part of this House.

Mr. SPINNER. They can.

Mr. BURNETT. Then, where is the necessity for the adoption of the resolution?

Mr. SPINNER. It is necessary for the reason that the Committee of Accounts regarded the resolution of the last Congress, although in contravention of law, as directory upon them and upon the officers of the House.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the object of this resolution—and I say it to the House—to give the employes of the last House of Representatives a compensation in which they are not entitled, and which they cannot have under the law. As the matter now stands, it is to extend that compensation back to the commencement of the last Congress, and not only that, but it is to authorize the present Doorkeeper to appoint an additional number of messengers as well as pages.

Mr. SPINNER. No, sir.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not understand it. The joint resolution might be for a larger compensation for a larger number of employes than was provided for by the resolutions of the last Congress.

Mr. SPINNER. With the gentleman's permission, I will state that the resolutions of the last House increased the number of messengers. The number is sufficiently large, and this resolution will not authorize the employment of any in addition.

Mr. BURNETT. This resolution is brought here under the plea of expediency. Now, if the gentleman wants merely to do that, let him introduce a resolution simply providing for the compensation of these eight pages.

Mr. SPINNER. The resolution is not only for paying the boys, but for paying the messengers, which is the principal object introducing it.

Mr. BURNETT. Exactly. I thought the object of the gentleman, as before stated, was to pay the boys.

Mr. SPINNER. Not at all. I did not say that was the principal object.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no desire to do the gentleman from New York injustice. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] spoke of the integrity and rigidity of the chairman of the Committee of Accounts, he spoke mainly, so far as I know. But, sir, if that be the gentleman's character—and I do not doubt it—the ought to have stated in his resolution the number of persons embraced in it, and the amount each is to receive. Let him bring forward his resolution in that shape, and the House can then act intelligently, and know exactly what they are doing.

Mr. SPINNER. I can give the gentleman the information he asks for; but, in the first place, let me say he is mistaken when he says that this resolution extends back to the commencement of the last Congress. Why, sir, the resolution of the last House was not adopted until May, and, of course, this cannot extend back beyond that time. Up to that time they received the compensation allowed by law. But, sir, if this resolution be adopted, the clerk will be paid $100 per day; the Doorkeeper $160 for about eighteen months; to pay the superintendent of the folding-room $300; to pay the Assistant Doorkeeper $100 89; to pay the messenger in charge of the Hall $445; to pay five messengers each $405; and night messengers $105 each; making an aggregate of not more than $5,200.

Mr. BURNETT. Now, sir, the gentleman from New York says, and I want this House to remember it, that $5,200 will cover the whole amount. In my opinion, that is not more than a mistake in his calculations. I will venture my judgment, that $5,200 is not one half the amount that will be covered under the authority of the Committee of Accounts when they come to audit the claims that will be presented, if you repeal the resolution of the last Congress. In my opinion, provided a compensation sufficient for each one to whom it applied. You increase the pay of fourteen messengers at three dollars per day; then of eleven messengers at $2 50 per day; in fact, sir, you increase the pay of the Doorkeeper himself, and of every subordinate under him—every one.

Mr. SPINNER. The gentleman is mistaken. Mr. BURNETT. Here are the resolutions of the last Congress:
